CHAPTER I.

ADRIANA.

"It would be ridiculous if I were to receive this young person alone, besides it would make you appear an unfeeling father who did not take the proper interest in the welfare of his children. Aside from that, your presence will produce a better impression on this woman, for seeing us together will show her that I do not act alone, that I have your support," said Madame Bourrier as she leaned back in her chair and looked at her husband who stood undecided by the door.

The Bourriers had made a fortune in a silk manufactory of Lyon, and since they had retired from the trade Madame Bourrier had been tireless in her efforts to enter titled society and in trying to make her new acquaintances forget by the splendor of their millions, that on either side, their ancestors were only coarse-grained peasants of base origin. Of a vain, selfish nature, she was unsupportably proud with inferiors and equally unsupportably servile with superiors.

In the hope of being nearer her beloved nobles, she had forced her husband to purchase one of the most sumptuous residences in Toulouse, the most aristocratic city of France. And there, by the expenditure of their living, by her gorgeous toilets and elegant equipages, she hoped to draw about her some of those nobles whose only wealth was an ancestral chateau and an ancient name. Besides the residence in this city they had also purchased a chateau in Brenigne, where, during the hunting season, they would lavishly entertain the few titled persons they had been able to rope in during the winter season.

Monsieur Bourrier, on the other hand, was the very opposite of his wife. Of a jovial disposition, without any of the arrogance of pride, he was as pleasant with the day laborer as with the prince, and therefore equally well liked by both. And this genial bonhommie did more to win the esteem of the exclusive society of Toulouse than did his wife's arrogance. Of her would be said:

"The conceited prig! What right has she to put on airs like that when, if it were not for her husband's millions, she would not be tolerated even in our antechambers."

But of her husband they would say:

"There's a man who hasn't an ounce of conceit and who, by forgetting that he is rich, makes you forget that he is not noble."

Thus it was that while Madame Bourrier thought that it was due to her elegance and the insolent display of her wealth that they were slowly making their way into the elite of the titled society of Toulouse, the truth was that she was simply endured because her husband was liked.

The cause of today's discussion was the hiring of a new governess for their children, Isabelle, aged eighteen, and Berthe, who was about to enter her sixteenth year. Besides these two daughters, they had a son of twenty-five, still in college at Paris.

"Such a large family!" would sigh the unfortunate mother. "So bourgeois, and not at all aristocratic in smallness!"

Their governess had left them the week before and today a new applicant was to present herself. Monsieur hesitated near the door at his wife's last remark, undecided whether to make a hasty escape now and face the storm afterwards, or to try to convince her that he was perfectly incompetent to judge the good or bad qualities of the governess. But, as usual, the fear of a scene and of the unreasonable reproaches with which his wife was sure to overwhelm him should he disobey her caprice, caused him to pause and say:

"But, my dear Constance, what would I know about her suitability as a governess. Such matters are for you to decide and—"

"Yes, yes, I know," interrupted Madame in her tones. "You do not take enough interest in the welfare of your daughters to make a study of such things, but it is not necessary that everybody should know how careless you are in these matters."

Monsieur Bourrier threw a resigned sigh as he slowly walked back to the fireplace by which his wife sat, and he asked:

"Well, what will you expect me to do?"

"Nothing. Just remain with me while I question this woman. All I want is the moral support of your presence."

Monsieur Bourrier ceased to protest. He knew his wife and for the sake of peace was willing to sacrifice his inclinations. So he resumed his seat and waited.

A few minutes later the doorbell rang and a liveried servant, dressed in scarlet and gold, announced the governess. She entered in a few minutes later, a fine elegant figure in a severe black gown of the latest cut. Her face was heavily veiled, but her general appearance indicated youth. With the ease of a well-bred person she advanced slowly toward Madame Bourrier, who with her critically from her eye-glass, and as she would some piece of furniture she wished to purchase.

"Madame, I must first beg your pardon for a delay in my arrival. A slight accident at the Place du Capitole delayed my carriage."

The voice was grave, almost sad, but extremely sweet and low, however, without the excessive amalgam of the hands and had the elegance of her mien, indicated more the lady than the governess.

"Her carriage!" thought Madame Bourrier with a sneer. "One would take her for a duchess to hear her speak! If she remains with me long I will soon teach her her place!"

Meanwhile she kept her critical eye on the woman before her, who, however, was not aware of the cause of embarrassment. At last she spoke:

"So you are the candidate for governess?" "I am."

Monsieur Bourrier, seeing that the strangher was still standing and feeling it was a lack of good breeding on their part, said as he smilingly indicated a chair:

"Will you not be seated, Mademoiselle, Madame Bourrier and I will have a few questions to ask you before we decide upon giving you the position."

A stranger than the stranger as she took her seat and a furious glance from his wife was the reward Monsieur Bourrier got for his courtesy. On seeing the look of anger flash in Constance Bourrier's eyes, the disdainful yet polite smile curled the governess' lips.

"If you please remove your veil, Mademoiselle—Mademoiselle—I have forgotten your name," said Madame with an imperious gesture. "In our world that they are very hard to recall," said Madame with more humor than ever.

Once more the half-contemptuous, half-amused smile curled the stranger's lips, then as she slowly unfastened her veil she said with a touch of irony in her tones:

"I don't doubt but what in an aristocratic mind the common name of Adriana Doban would seem hard to recall, as it would in other noble birth nor wealth."

Madame Bourrier flushed under the delicate rouge that adorned more by the voice than by the words, but she had no time to reply, for the veil being removed she saw her visitor's face and its tragic beauty left her an instant without words.

The face was beautiful, though tragically sad. The large brown eyes were filled with a strange fire of pride, almost of defiance, while the somewhat reckless smile which parted the sensitive lips indicated a will of steel, a soul, which, having suffered all the tortures of despair and disappointment, is in open rebellion with God and man.

Madame Bourrier did not remain long under the spell of surprise caused by the unexpected beauty, but she remarked in mercy tones than before:

"You are very young to teach. I had hoped to secure some one with more experience—and—and more knowledge of the world. My elder daughter is to make her debut this winter and I wished some one who could fit her for that end."

"I am not as young as you seem to think, Madame," slowly replied the governess, "since I am past thirty. Besides, when I have accepted for Mademoiselle de Charneuse, before her marriage to the Duc de Bois-Fleury, I had an excellent opportunity to learn the ways of society, since I was treated as one of the family."

"But you surely would not expect that of us! You will, I hope, know how to keep your proper station," said Madame Bourrier, somewhat alarmed by the governess' words.

"Have no fear," and a smile passed like a shadow over the expressive face. "You would not let me forget my place and I am not a person to take liberties which are not offered me."

This was said in such haughty tones and with such a proud toss of the head, that for an instant Madame Bourrier was abashed and to cover her embarrassment she hastened to say:

"I have brought a recommendation from your late place, have you not?"

"Yes, here is a letter from Madame de Bois-Fleury, and should this not be enough you can write her and further inquire concerning me," and the governess handed a letter to Madame Bourrier.

Her hand quivered with pleasure as she touched that letter. Here at the bottom of the ladder, yet most nobly born, was one of the oldest, most noble names of France, that of Bois-Fleury! A slight smile of disdain contained in the letter with evident satisfaction, for she might hereafter boast that her daughter had been under the most especially recommended to her by Madame de Bois-Fleury.

"I speak English and Spanish."

"Where were you educated?"

"I spent several years in Paris at the convent of the Sacre-Coeur."

"Dames du Sacre-Coeur!" exclaimed Madame in surprise. "Only the daughters of the nobility are admitted in that institution!"

The governess bit her lip, while a sudden flush of color lit up the pale cheeks, then in hurried tones, after giving my lessons I took special courses in the branches in which I wished to perfect myself."

"Ah, I see. Though from the way you first spoke one would have thought you had been there as a pupil."

"You seem to forget, Madame, that it takes a noble name and a certain manner to be a pupil in that institution!" and a strange smile crossed the governess' face.

"You are right. For an instant I forgot to whom I was speaking. Have you a letter from the Sacre-Coeur?"

Adriana rose and with a proud gesture handed her letter. Madame read:

"If the name of Madame de Bois-Fleury is a sufficient guarantee for the worthy possible of being the governess of your daughters," with an involuntary inflection on "your," "I will say that you could not be so hard to satisfy."

Then came the endorsement as though to take the letter which Madame Bourrier had handed to her husband to read, but Madame detained her with a slight, yet tender, already subdued by the proud dignity of the governess.

"Why, Mademoiselle Doban, I meant nothing by that remark. I am sure that you had been selected from the letter of references from the Sacre-Coeur. The name, as you have just said, is one of the most established Madame de Bois-Fleury. Is all the proof I need. You will remain, of course."

For an instant the governess hesitated, then with an almost invisible shrug of the shoulders she remarked in more than polite tones:

"Oh, I play both the piano and the violin, while I took lessons in vocal training from Signor Cavagliosi, the Italian tenor."

"Cavagliosi!" exclaimed he never gave lessons outside of the nobility and that even then one had first to be presented to him before he would condescend to give instruction."

An impatient frown contracted the governess' brow, while her hands clenched nervously on her lap, as she answered rather abruptly:

"He must have occasionally made exceptions, for he certainly did give me lessons."

"Well," at last said Madame after a slight pause," do you not think, Hector, that we had better make arrangements with Mademoiselle?"

"Why, my dear," said the unfortunate Monsieur Bourrier, who was ill at ease in his position during the conversation, "whatever you think best in the matter will suit me," and rising, he walked rapidly to the door where he paused for an instant to say: "Will you come to my room with Mademoiselle, I will take a look at the stables?"

And without heeding the evident displeasure which gathered on his wife's brow, he bowed gravely to the governess, and with a serious bow and a smile of sympathy to the governess.

CHAPTER II.

IN THE SCHOOLROOM.

While this was taking place in the drawing-room, upstairs in the schoolroom the two sisters were impatiently waiting for their fate to be decided. A change of governess meant much to the two girls, since, with their mother's mistaken ideas of etiquette, they were kept almost in confinement in the schoolroom, the governess being their constant companion. In her unreasoned pride, Madame Bourrier allowed her daughters none of the intimate homelife of the bourgeois family. Aside from a daily ride with her in the chaise and an hour in the evening spent in the drawing-room, they remained in semi-confinement in the schoolroom. Madame Bourrier thought that the seclusion of the governess from the family circle indicated a truly aristocratic taste. She therefore deprived both her husband and herself of the pleasure of having more in common with their children.

Monsieur Bourrier had tried to protest but as usual he had for the sake of domestic peace to submit to the will of his wife's whims. Not being able to have his daughters with him, he had formed the habit of going up to them whenever his wife was detained downtown by her shopping or attending luncheon with friends. On those days all studies were abandoned and he was able to preside over the informal meal taken by his daughters in the schoolroom, and these moments of relaxation were the only time the poor child he had to endure when dining or lunching with his wife in the grand dining-room downstairs.

The girls adored their father and these stolen feasts were like rays of sunshine in the gloomy routine of their daily life. The question of the liking of a new governess was the first thought of Adriana and Isabelle. Would she be a weak, subdued creature, like the one who had been dismissed, or a person like another whose strict enforcement of the rules of etiquette would have rendered their liberty more than ever enjoyed?

Hence, seated by the brightly burning fire, the two sisters were waiting in silence. They had discussed the subject so often between themselves that they had ceased to say and all they could do was to wait. So they remained, each absorbed in her own thoughts.

Isabelle, the elder of the two, was a beautiful girl, tall and gracefully five feet one inch in height, with a sweet, flower-like face, delicately fair, with large and tender, her mother's pernicious advice had already spoiled the masterpiece of Nature, but there was no trace of pride and arrogance which the mother had so sedulously fostered in the child, and her eyes were beginning to bear fruit and Isabelle had already lost the charm of sweet, childlike gaiety and was beginning to respond only to her mother's insufferable priggishness.

As to Berthe, she had inherited with her father's strong constitution all his gay, good-humored temperament, independence of spirit and was as pleasant and friendly with the servants as with the members of her own aristocratic friends. Taller than her sister by four inches, big-boned, with a face full of health and color, she was the despair of her mother and the pride and favorite of her father.

"Oh, that child!" Madame would often say, "she is impossible. She is more like a milkmaid than a lady! What punishment to think that a daughter of mine should be so common!" and in despair at the ignorance. I will never dare to introduce her to the world! She will disgrace me with belle!"

But Monsieur Bourrier, who admired farmer Berthe's lively, unaffected manner, than Isabelle's haughty grace and studied demeanor, would shrug his shoulders and say:

"Why, Constance, what do you find out of the way with Berthe? She has a fine, pretty and expressive face, full of life and intelligence?"

"Yes, Monsieur, very bourreois are your tastes! Berthe has beauty, it is true, but it is the vulgar sort. Her cheeks are so very red!"

"Why, my dear, you should be thankful for that. It is a sign of health and a strong constitution. For my part, I prefer Berthe's color to Isabelle's pallor, her rosy face than Isabelle with her sickly pallor. She is so frail that one is afraid to touch her for fear of breaking her to pieces."

Then Madame Bourrier would shrug her shapely shoulders and say with evident contempt for her husband's taste:

"You are a weak creature, Hector!"

This would end the discussion for the time being, but Madame Bourrier was thankful that his wife would ever have the tact to broach the unpleasant and somewhat delicate subject of the relative value of their two daughters.

On the other hand Berthe looked up from her stare at the fire and turning to her sister questioned:

"Do you think the lady we saw entering the garden a while ago was the governess?"

"Without a doubt," said Isabelle, in a soft, low voice, so different from the loud, hearty tones of her younger sister. "I believe minutes past the hour appointed for her coming."

"But what do you think of her?"

"How can I tell, since I did not see her face? She appeared very graceful, very tall and her dress, though severe in cut and color, looked very stylish. I don't think I care very little about her appearance; all I wish is that she be well versed in the languages, for I won't go back to the study of make of her a companion, far less a friend."

"Oh! you are horrid!" cried Berthe, as she gave her sister a look of indignation. "Berthe after some seconds of silence. "When one has to live day after day with the same people, it is very pleasant to have a new and pretty face to look at."

Before Isabelle had time to answer, since the door opened and Madame Bourrier and the governess entered. The arrangements had been concluded and Madame satisfied herself of the ex-manufacturer's wife, who had found, during the interview, Mademoiselle Doban showed a surprising unconcern in regard to wages. One would almost think that money matters were of supreme indifference to her. Madame Bourrier had therefore taken advantage of this disinterestedness and had secured the services of the new governess at a lower rate than she had ever paid before, at the same time feeling sure that she was securing a higher grade of service than if she had ever been her good fortune to obtain. Now that everything had been arranged, she was bringing Adriana up to introduce her to her new charges.

The governess' beauty produced its usual effect on the two girls and they at once fell under its spell. Madame Bourrier made two haughty by the excellent bargain she had just concluded, introduced Adriana, saying:

"My dears, this is Mademoiselle Doban, whose services I have secured for you. Mademoiselle, my daughters, Mademoiselle Isabelle and Mademoiselle Berthe."

Adriana bowed and with a faint smile lit up for an instant the gloom of her face, she said:

"I hope, Mademoiselles, 'that we will get along nicely together and find in the association of the schoolroom the happiness and profit."

Isabelle drew herself up with an instinctive gesture of hauteur, while impulsive Berthe hastened to exclaim, in spite of the mocking displeasure which gathered on her mother's and sister's faces:

"Oh, I am sure we will soon be the best of friends!"

Adriana saw the look which greeted this remark, and in an instant her face seemed to her lips, she hastened to say:

"I do not hope for your friendship, Mademoiselle, though it would brighten my life to think that you considered me more than a servant, but I will be quite content if my advancement as to expect more than your tolerance and, in time, perhaps, a little respect for the aid I may be able to give you in your studies."

These last words were addressed to the younger girl, Adriana's penetrative eye watched the face of the elder sister and she saw that her words had chased the frown which Berthe's impulsive speech had called forth, from the brow.

"I am glad to see that you are so sensible, Mademoiselle," remarked Madame, much pleased with the governess' reply, "and that you will know how to keep your place in spite of my younger daughter's vulgar familiarity."

Adriana's face filled Berthe's eyes. Adriana saw them, but said nothing, waiting patiently for the storm which would burst the young girl, she might explain the reason of her seeming rejection of her generous offer of friendship.

"Your duties will be simple, Mademoiselle," continued Madame after a moment's pause. "You will assist my younger daughter in all her studies and hear the elder recite. Mademoiselle Isabelle you will give advanced lessons in music, singing, the elder and Spanish. Your meals will be served in the schoolroom with your pupils, since they are never permitted to dine with us—we entertain so much company. Mademoiselle has made her debut you will have only Mademoiselle Berthe to look after. I will take sole charge of my elder daughter."

Adriana bowed but said nothing and Madame continued:

"Your sleeping apartment is on the other side of the hall, and as I think that that is all you must be tired, Mademoiselle Berthe will conduct you to it. Tomorrow morning you will enter on your duties. Mademoiselles can tell you much better than I about their advancement in the studies."

"I will have some hours of absolute liberty, Madame?"

"Why, certainly. I forgot to mention that Sunday afternoons would be yours. During the morning, Mademoiselle would be expected to accompany the young ladies to mass. You can also have an hour every day to yourself to walk or read as you wish. Aside from that I shall expect you to devote all your time to my girls."

"Very well, Madame. Now if Mademoiselle Berthe would please conduct me to my room I will be very sorry for the inconvenients' rest before dinner."

Berthe and the governess were moving toward the door, when a thought struck Madame Bourrier and caused her to recall Adriana.

"Mademoiselle," she said, "one more remark, please. You are young and pretty, and I have more than once noticed that Isabelle has wished. My son, who is at present at Madame Bourrier's country seat for his vacations. He often brings young friends with him, and I trust and think that I would not tolerate any flirting on your part and——"

"Madame!" and such a flash of anger and wounded pride filled the governess' eye that Madame Bourrier was abashed. For an instant Adriana did not speak. It was easy to see that she was battling with her anger and seeking to get it well under control before she spoke. At last with a hauteur which surpassed all that the ex-manufacturer's wife had ever attempted, she said:

"I am not used to being insulted, and before we have spoken another word I will say that I will not stand it from you or any one. As long as I do nothing to infringe on the rights of propriety I forbid any one to even hint that I might. I am willing to do the work I am engaged to do, but I have no desire or even desire to be treated as your equal, but I will not allow myself to be treated with proper respect. If you don't want to take me on those conditions we will let the matter drop and I will return to Paris at once."

This spirited reply quelled Madame Bourrier and she stammered, at a loss what to say:

"I beg your pardon, Mademoiselle. I did not mean to offend you. I merely wished to give you some motherly advice. Your youth and your beauty might have turned the heads of those hot-headed youths and——"

"Very well, Madame," shortly interrupted Adriana, "I accept your excuses, only I hope that I will not have to again express my desire on the subject," and with the dignity of an offended queen Adriana swept past Madame Bourrier and followed Berthe from the room.

"Well, the impertinence!" at last exclaimed Madame, exasperated by her hypo-

St. Paul Pack Incident.

"After drinking coffee for breakfast I always felt languid and dull, having no ambition to get to my morning duties. Then by about an hour or so a weak, nervous derangement of the heart and stomach would come over me with such force I would frequently have to lie down.

"At other times I had severe headaches; stomach finally became affected and dizziness so impaired that I had serious chronic dyspepsia and constipation. A lady, for many years State President of the W. C. T. U., told me she had been greatly benefited by quitting coffee and using Postum Food Coffee; she was troubled for years with asthma. She said it was no cross to quit coffee when she found she could have as delicious an article as Postum.

"Another lady, who had been troubled with chronic dyspepsia for years, found immediate relief on ceasing coffee and beginning Postum twice a day. She was wholly cured. Still another friend told me that Postum Food Coffee was a godsend to her, her heart trouble having been relieved after leaving off coffee and taking on Postum.

"So many such cases came to my notice that I concluded coffee was the cause of my trouble and I quit and took up Postum. I am more than pleased to say that my days of trouble have disappeared. I am well and happy." "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

untary submission before the governess. "If that woman takes on airs like that toward me I will make short work in dismissing her—the insolent hussy!"

"But, mother, your remark was insulting," protested Isabelle. "I would have felt as angry as she, had any one made that remark to me."

"Oh, with you it would be different. You are a lady and would naturally feel those things, but she—why, she's only a governess! Still, I suppose we will have to put up with her for some time at least. We must absolutely have some one to look after you two girls and she has the very best references. Come, let us descend to the library. I want you to write a letter for me to Madame de Bois-Fleury to see if the letter of recommendation the woman gave me is genuine."

Meanwhile Berthe had conducted the governess to her room. At the door, just as the young girl was about to leave her, Adriana laid a detaining hand on her arm and in tones filled with a hidden sorrow seeking to find expression, said:

"My dear child, though a few moments ago I seemed to repulse your offer of friendship, it was not that I was not grateful for the offer, but because I remembered that for the present at least you were Mademoiselle Bourrier and that I was only your governess. Still, my child, if in spite of that, you find in your heart the desire to love me a little, do so, for, alas, I have far more need of love than of money."

And without giving Berthe time to recover from her surprise, the governess had entered her room and closed the door.

CHAPTER III.

MADAME DE BOIS-FLEURY.

A month later Madame Bourrier was seated alone in the drawing-room waiting for the carriage which in half an hour was to take her daughters and herself for their daily drive. She was thinking of the governess, a thing which she often did of late and which surprised her greatly, since she was the first time she had given a second thought to so inferior a being as her daughters' instructor.

But Adriana Doban had such a queer personality that no one could pass by her with indifference. Besides, a week, with woman like Madame Bourrier would naturally feel more the question of the other's strength, coupled to which was the intuitive grace and perfect good breeding of the lady.

The improvement in her daughters' behavior was almost marvellous in its rapidity, and she was gratified to see that already they had acquired that subtle, indefinable something which marks out even to the casual observer the cultured lady. She had long felt that this was the one thing they lacked and that, in spite of their millions, they might always lack. Therefore, what had not been her surprise, when only a few days after the arrival of the new governess, she had begun to notice in both of her daughters that nicety of manner which had been a stranger to them and her envy when chance brought her in contact with ladies of rank.

When she questioned her elder daughter about the change, Isabelle had laughed as she answered:

"Mademoiselle Doban has such a queer system for teaching us deportment and etiquette. All her instructions are given on the violin."

"On the violin? I don't understand!" exclaimed Madame Bourrier in surprise.

"Yes, on the violin. She says a tone by which we learn to walk with grace, a prolonged one at which we learn how to sit with the different motions one must go through to enter or to leave a drawing-room, to take a seat gracefully, or to cross a room without embarrassment. Come up tomorrow morning at 8 and you can see for yourself."

Full of curiosity, Madame Bourrier did not fail to accept her daughter's invitation, and the next morning she was present when the new governess gave her daily lesson in deportment to her two charges.

Seated at the farther end of the room with her violin posed gracefully on her shoulder, Adriana received Isabelle to step out into the hall and at a given signal—a note in crescendo—to enter the room as though in search of such a select company. She now began to play, and at the note Isabelle, with the young girl expected in the room and walked toward her mother, her footsteps seeming to glide with the notes of the violin and the melody from the instrument seeming to find expression in the undulating grace of the figure. When Isabelle was within a few feet of her mother, a prolonged, descending note from the violin caused her to bow with all the flourished elegance Madame Bourrier had so often noticed in women of rank.

Madame was so astonished by this unusual performance that she turned to the governess with the exclamation:

"Where did you learn that system, Mademoiselle? It is remarkable."

"That, Madame, is the way the young ladies of the French nobility are taught ease of manner and elegance in their walk. The melody which accompanies these exercises gives so deeply impressed upon the mind that in after life, as we walk, its sound seems to guide our steps and give to our slightest movements the slow grace of its harmony."

"You speak as though you belonged to the nobility, Mademoiselle," remarked Madame Bourrier somewhat piqued that the governess should dare class herself with the noblest daughters of France.

Adriana looked up in a smile of contemptuous irony, then replied as she motioned Berthe to take her sister's place in the hall:

"I belong to the class of women who have learned to walk and move to the sound of music, Madame, but with me the knowledge was gained, not to shine in the social world, but rather that I might impart it to future pupils."

Then taking up her violin she began to play anew and Berthe, with less grace, perhaps, than her sister, but with none of her former brskness of manner, went through the same exercise as Isabelle. When this was finished Madame Bourrier turned her delighted face to the governess and asked:

"Do you think, Mademoiselle, that my younger daughter will ever acquire the grace and repose of manner which is so natural with her sister?"

"She most certainly shall," warmly replied Adriana, as she cast an affectionate glance toward her younger pupil. "Mademoiselle Berthe is but a mere tyro as yet, who no longer is a child nor yet is she a young lady. Her body is overgrown and the frame which, five years from now, will develop into a stately, queenly woman, is today in the way, making her self-conscious and giving to her movements a certain awkwardness, which, in the course of a few months, will have changed into perfect grace and ease of manner. You will be surprised, Madame, a year from now at the change which will have come over Mademoiselle."

It was of this conversation and mostly of the last remark of which Madame Bourrier was thinking as she waited for the carriage. Before Berthe had left for school she had entered the room and the remarkable improvement which had already taken place in the young girl, not only in her walk and gestures, but also in the tones of the voice, which had now lost all the boisterous ring of old, was evident.

Suddenly Madame Bourrier was called out of her reverie by a knock at the door, followed by the entry of a servant bearing on a gold platter a square of bristol. She took up the card with a somewhat annoyed gesture, but at the sight of the name which greeted her eyes, her face turned first pale, then flushed scarlet with pleasure. The name was that of Madame de Bois-Fleury, that is, it represented the oldest nobility of France, such as she had never had honored with their presence the home of the exquartzmurier of Lyons.

"Baptiste," said Madame, swelling her throat in excess of her pride, "you may admit Madame la Duchesse de Bois-Fleury. I am always at home for such callers and am surprised that you should have kept Madame la Duchesse waiting in the hall."

The servant hastened to obey and Madame Bourrier, with a rapidly beating heart, rose to greet the visitor, whom Baptiste was now announcing in his most pompous voice:

"Madame la Duchesse de Bois-Fleury."

The person thus announced advanced slowly into the room with that easy assurance the secret of which Madame never knew but could not acquire. Her dress, of costly simplicity, was severe in cut and sober in color, nothing like the gorgeous gowns worn by Madame Bourrier in and out of season. Her head was surmounted by a heavy veil and the first impression on beholding her was the same as that produced by the young governess when she had entered this very room a month before.

Madame Bourrier advanced with great deference toward her visitor and with a low bow said in her most servile tones:

"Madame la Duchesse honors the humble home I call mine in her in my home."

The visitor bowed and extended her hand, saying:

"I have the pleasure of speaking to Madame Bourrier, I believe."

Madame Bourrier stammered her reply and more embarrassed than she had ever been before she motioned to the other visitor, while her eager eyes sought to penetrate beneath the thick veil which almost concealed the features.

Madame de Bois-Fleury took the offered seat, then for a few seconds silence fell between the two. She at last turned to Madame Bourrier with the question:

"You hired a new governess about a month ago, I am told, Madame?"

This question put Madame Bourrier at her ease at once, since this was a subject on which she knew she could talk with her distinguished visitor.

"Oh, yes," she replied with great eagerness, "that dear Mademoiselle Doban whom I would offer to present to you, for she is indeed a treasure and I don't know how to express my gratitude for—"

But at that moment Berthe, pushed onward by an unexplainable emotion, Madame de Bois-Fleury, had entered the room, and the sudden exclamation of surprise and den excitement marring the usual clearness of her voice:

"Yes, yes, I know. I also answered your letter of inquiry addressed to me after you had hired her. But since I tell me, are you contented? Does she seem happy? I am dying for news and had I dared I would have come myself to see."

Berthe had entered the room so suddenly and with such impetuosity that she had not noticed the presence of the visitor, but at the sound of the voice she stopped short, then with a cry of joy rushed forward, exclaiming:

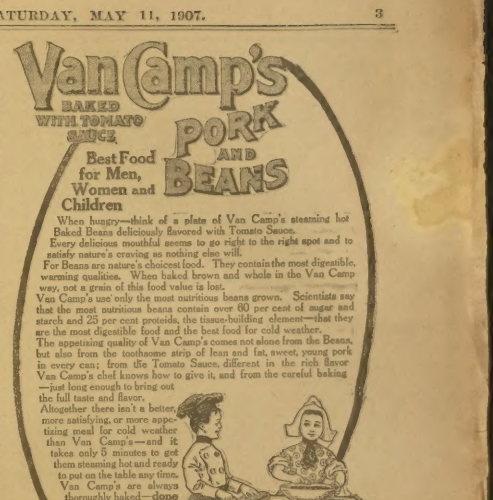
"Madame la Duchesse!"

Madame Bourrier was lost in surprise. The emotion and evident love betrayed by the Duchesse's words and manner seemed so out of keeping with the cause which gave rise to it, that she turned to the other veil which concealed the face and which, in this case, she could not order removed as she had done that of the governess. She managed, in spite of her astonishment, to reply:

"Mademoiselle Doban seems contented, but I don't think very happy, for she often revels a deep sadness on the face which nothing has the power to efface. I judged from this, that she had grieved to our self she must have lost some one, she is always in black."

"Yes, yes, you're right," hastened to exclaim Madame de Bois-Fleury, "she is in mourning—for her father, her mother, her brother—I don't remember which—to whom she was greatly attached. I can guess the reason why I—I was so very anxious about her."

The face beneath the veil was crimson and the utterance embarrassed. Madame Bourrier was lost in wonder. Was this the much boasted of self-possession of the gentlewomen? Besides, why this emotion, why that hesitation, that embarrassment? But Madame de Bois-Fleury did not give her time to reflect much on these vexed questions, for she hastened to ask:



Van Camp's
BAKED
Best Food for Men, Women and Children
When hungry—think of a plate of Van Camp's steaming hot Baked Beans deliciously flavored with Tomato Sauce.
Every delicious mouthful seems to go right to the right spot and to satisfy nature's craving as nothing else will.
For Beans are nature's choicest food. They contain the most digestible, warming qualities. When baked brown and whole in the Van Camp way, not a grain of this food value is lost.
Van Camp's use only the most nutritious beans grown. Scientists say that the most nutritious beans contain over 60 per cent of sugar and starch and 20 per cent gluten, the tissue-building element—that they are the most digestible food and the best food for cold weather.
The appetising quality of Van Camp's comes not alone from the Beans, but also from the toothsome strip of lean and fat, sweet, young pork in every can; from the Tomato Sauce, different in the rich flavor Van Camp's chefs know how to give it, and from the careful baking—just long enough to bring out the full taste and flavor.
Altogether there isn't a better, more satisfying, or more appetizing meal for cold weather than Van Camp's—and it takes only 5 minutes to get them steaming hot and ready to put on the table any time.
Van Camp's are always thoroughly baked—done to a turn—when you get them from your grocer.
Always keep a few cans in the house.

"Could I not see—Mademoiselle Doban? I would be grateful to you if you could spare me for a few minutes."

"Most certainly. I will ring and have her descend."

"Please don't. Let me go up to her, let me see her alone for a few moments," and a strange nervousness shook the visitor and caused her hands to tremble on her lap.

Most surprised, Madame Bourrier complied with her visitor's request and rose and took the trouble to conduct her herself to the schoolroom. As they reached the door, Isabelle and Berthe, dressed for the afternoon ride, came down. Madame Bourrier introduced her daughters to the visitor, and after telling them to wait for her in the drawing-room below, she opened the door and allowed Madame de Bois-Fleury to precede her into the apartment which had served as schoolroom.

Adriana had just turned to the door and did not turn at the sound the two women made in entering. She was standing by the window, her eyes fixed afar on the band of blue sky and the tops of the trees in a nearby park, on which the breath of early spring had cast a veil of green.

Madame Bourrier was about to call the governess's attention, but Madame de Bois-Fleury, recovering somewhat from the emotion which, for a second had left her speechless, called softly:

"Adriana!"

A thunderclap falling at her feet would not have produced a more startling effect than the governess at that soft, almost pleading voice. She turned, her face suddenly livid, her eyes wild and staring, her whole body trembling as about to fall.

Madame de Bois-Fleury did not wait to see more. With a heartbroken cry, she rushed to the trembling woman and clasping her in her arms, murmured in broken accents:

"Pardon my coming, Adriana, but I could not stay away from you longer."

Adriana had recovered from her emotion and in tones of deep reproach answered:

"Whatever you do, Marguerite, don't let her see your face." Then aloud to Madame Bourrier, who had remained a mute but surprised witness of the scene: "Madame de Bois-Fleury always had the kindness to treat me as an equal, and during the time I had the happiness of being her governess we were more like sisters than like instructor and pupil. Her greeting just now is but an added proof of the great love she still has for me."

Such unexplainable emotion filled the young duchess's feeling her strength leaving her, she sank upon a divan while Madame Bourrier remained by the open door, undecided what to do, too surprised to either speak or move.

Adriana hesitated an instant, then seeing that Madame Bourrier did not seem inclined to leave the room, said with the tone of authority which sometimes broke her haughty submission:

"Madame, this is, I believe, my hour of liberty, and I shall enjoy it doubly in tete-a-tete with my former pupil, with whom I have so many recollections in common."

Madame Bourrier blushed at this delicate hint, and bowing to Madame de Bois-Fleury, said:

"I hope to see you again before you leave, Madame la Duchesse?"

"Certainly," answered Madame de Bois-Fleury.

Then, in spite of her devouring curiosity, Madame Bourrier was forced to retire and leave the two young women together.

Saving Him Trouble.

There is a waiter in a cafe in Richmond who is the scene of polite attention, endeavoring to relieve every one of unnecessary trouble. The other day a man came in who was sized up by John as probably a "Sir" case," but the service was fully up to the usual standard. The bill came to 40 cents, and the man handed out a dollar bill.

John then proceeded to help the man into his coat.

"Where's my change?" the customer asked.

"Change, sah? Dar ain't none—dat was tush up, tank yo', sah!" John said with a bow.

"But I hadn't given it to you," the man protested.

"Oh, course not, sah. Ah wouldn't 'low you ter go ter all dat trouble, sah!" John said with another bow, and the man went out, looking a trifle dazed.

Forgot the Occasion.

At a banquet of clergymen recently the subject of absent-minded people was under discussion and yarns ancient and of recent origin were told by several speakers. It is seldom that ministers compete with one another to tell stories that tax the credulity of their hearers, but upon this occasion Rev. Dr. Dana, pastor of the Walnut street Presbyterian Church, carried off the honors.

"There was a physician whose absent-mindedness was so marked that it often caused queer complications," said Dr. Dana. "Why, when he was married the minister told him to place the wedding ring on his bride's finger."

"He reached for her, felt her pulse, and as it was very naturally beating faster than normal, exclaimed: "Let me see your tongue."

CHAPTER V.

"What shall I do? Oh, what shall I do?" wondered Jennet Dare.

She was pacing up and down her room, with clenched hands and drawn, colorless face. She did not know how she had got through the usual routine of the evening, for her head pained from open defiance into a storm of tears, and finally to an outburst of penitence.

"Oh, I'm sorry—I'm sorry!" he wailed. "I wish I hadn't spoiled the pictures! I do love Uncle Serge. Oh, Miss Dare, mayn't I find some indis-rubber and run downstairs to rub out the pencil-marks before he comes home?"

But Jennet was unyielding, and at last to her relief the child had sobbed himself to sleep, and the governess was free to seek the solitude she craved.

Up and down she paced long after the household had retired to rest, leaving a footman and two ladies' maids to keep their weary vigil until the carriage should return. She had no thought at first save a wild, fierce exultation. Her search was over at last, and Jennet Dare's destroyer was in her power. She only regretted that she had not retained sufficient presence of mind to bring away the two incriminating sketches instead of putting them back in the portfolio.

"I should have kept them," she told herself. And then, like a sudden inspiration, came the thought that she might go down to the room and secure them. Price, the footman, would be dozing in the butler's room, and the maids were keeping each other company in the servants' sitting-room. Jennet ceased her restless pacing, and, after a few moments of eager reflection, decided to make the attempt.

It was striking half-past twelve as she stepped out into the corridor, for the half-way down the passage when the wall-lamp sobs that had arrested her attention on the evening of her arrival at the Hall again smote her ear. She had listened for them in the vain for many a day and week, and had sometimes doubted the evidence of her senses, but now—now she knew that she had not been mistaken.

She sprung forward so suddenly that her candle slipped out of its stick and fell, extinguishing itself as it did so. But Jennet would not wait to replace it. In the wall accustomed to finding her way to the landing without a light, and knew every step of the way. A few seconds later and she was leaning tremblingly over the balustrade.

There was no light below, save a dim reflection from the lamp that had been left burning in the vestibule, but she could just make out the wraith-like figure noiselessly gliding down the passage, and she heard the stifled moan.

"Emmeline!" she whispered. "Emmeline!"

There was a pause. Jennet's knees were shaking, and her heart grew numb with the mysterious fear that overwhelms the bravest amongst us when we seem about to penetrate beyond the limit of the visible world. She heard what sounded like a murmur of welcome—like the echo of a sigh of footsteps and an unearthly whisper.

"Come away—come away!" said a strange, gasping voice.

And once again the figure turned and glided away so rapidly and noiselessly that before Jennet could move or speak it had disappeared, vanishing into the darkness.

Jennet followed it, stumbling down the wide, shallow stairs with a total disregard for her own safety.

"Ah—wait, wait!" she pleaded; but, though she thought she saw the figure, her cry her voice was inaudible. As her foot touched the last step she fancied she heard the soft creak of a door opening, but she felt pressed onward, feeling her way along the oak panels and whispering her passionate entreaties.

Suddenly she caught her foot in something and stumbled, striking her head as she fell, and sinking unconscious on the floor. She lay there for nearly ten minutes absolutely motionless, her pale face upturned in the darkness. At the end of that time the baize door at the further end of the passage opened cautiously, and Mrs. Mellor appeared, candle in hand, wrapped in an old-fashioned chintz dressing-gown, and looking even smaller and more haggard than she did by night.

"I thought I heard a noise," she muttered, and then she saw the dark heap on the floor and gave a little gasp of dismay.

Jennet came to her senses a few seconds later to find the housekeeper bending over her bathing her head. The governess had struck her forehead on a sharp edge of the cornice, but, though she still felt giddy and shaken, there was no real harm done.

The almost grotesque figure of the woman who was waiting upon her was the first thing that met Jennet's eyes, and she burst into a subdued paroxysm of hysterical laughter.

"You!" she exclaimed. "I thought—I thought——"

"I don't know what you thought, nor how you came here, miss, at the time of night," said Mrs. Mellor severely. "But I'm sure you've no call to be wandering about, and I shall feel it my duty to speak to the master if it happens again."

"It won't happen again," said Jennet in a strange voice. "Mrs. Mellor, did you hear——"

"I heard you falling," interrupted the housekeeper, "and I thought I must see what I was asleep, but it woke me, and I jumped up thinking something must have happened to Mr. Serge, or that there were thieves in the house. I scarcely dared come out, and I'm all of a tremble still."

Indeed she was shaking from head to foot and kept looking over her shoulder in a scared way.

"Have the goodness to light me upstairs, if you please," said Jennet haughtily. "I dropped my candle on the way."

Mrs. Mellor obeyed in silence.

"Be quick then, miss," she said, as Jennet paused to steady herself as she spoke the housekeeper looked over her shoulder again in the same furtive manner. As soon as the governess gained the top of the stairs Mrs. Mellor returned with all haste to her own quarters, locking the door behind her.

Jennet lay down on her bed. She meant to make the dearest plan and obtain the sketches, but she wanted time to collect herself and to recover from the shock of her fall. Strange to say, she did not feel so certain now as to the reality of the vision. She could not remember if the white, shrouded the shadowy figure; she had been terribly excited, and her nerves had been quite shaken her physically and seemed to have dulled her overstrung nerves.

"I suppose I must go," she said, talking herself. Presently she grew less dizzy and began to plan out her course. Mr. Serge Arklee's sitting-room, for she was determined to get both of the sketches before she attempted to bring his sin home to him. She knew that the carriage would not be back for another hour, and that a few minutes longer lest Mrs. Mellor should be still on the alert, or, if she had gone to bed, she knew that her candle was guttering in its socket and the gray dawn was creeping through the window-blinds. Sleep had overtaken her unawares, and the opportunity had slipped by. When she awoke it was nearly half-past four, the birds were beginning a drowsy twitter and the light was growing clear and cold.

Jennet wrung her hands in her vexation, and then springing up, she hurried to the door.

"I will go now," she thought. "They will surely be all in bed and safe, and if I am caught I can frame some excuse."

She was wrong. Sheer sleep and the effects of the blow on her head as she stole swiftly downstairs and along the passage, knew nothing of her, and down had robbed of its eerie appearance.

The sitting-room door was unlocked and Jennet entered. All was exactly as she had left it—the portfolio still lay on the table in the recess where she had thrown it. She opened it, and was sorting the contents with shaking fingers when a sudden instinct of warning, the French window on her left was noiselessly unlatched and Serge Arklee was standing on the threshold. Jennet did not know that this was his usual mode of entrance when returning from his morning ride, for his rooms all opened out on the veranda at the back of the house, but she knew in her life she was too much startled to disguise her real feelings.

Her face blanched, changed, shrinking away with a gesture of hatred from the astounded young man, who, for his part, scarcely knew whether the governess or the mysterious fear that overwhelms the bravest amongst us when we seem about to penetrate beyond the limit of the visible world. She heard what sounded like a murmur of welcome—like the echo of a sigh of footsteps and an unearthly whisper.

"Some away—come away!" said a strange, gasping voice.

And once again the figure turned and glided away so rapidly and noiselessly that before Jennet could move or speak it had disappeared, vanishing into the darkness.

Jennet followed it, stumbling down the wide, shallow stairs with a total disregard for her own safety.

"Ah—wait, wait!" she pleaded; but, though she thought she saw the figure, her cry her voice was inaudible. "I don't know what you thought, nor how you came here, miss, at the time of night," said Mrs. Mellor severely. "But I'm sure you've no call to be wandering about, and I shall feel it my duty to speak to the master if it happens again."

"I've something to say to you, Miss Maple," she murmured, glancing at the child. Rose took the hint at once.

"Run up to the orchard, my darling," she said. "You will find the rector there."

"Why doesn't she give you Uncle Serge's letter?" asked Bert as he obeyed.

In an instant Rose's fair face was aflame, and she held out her hand, looking half angry into her father's face.

Jennet placed the envelope in the little fingers.

"You want me to go now?" she said. "You want to read your love letter alone. It is the first you have ever had private, but it is not the first he has written!"

Her voice and manner were so terrible in their tragic intensity that Rose at once fell under the spell. Her blue eyes dilated with terror and her lips quivered piteously.

"What do you mean?" she whispered. "Of whom are you speaking?"

"I'm speaking of Serge Arklee!" replied Jennet. "Of the man who broke the heart of a girl as young and beautiful as you, Miss Maple, nine years ago—who stole her innocent love and then flung her aside to die!"

"You are mad! Hush, hush! Oh, pray, hush!" cried Rose.

"I am not mad," said Jennet quietly. "I am speaking the truth—the cruel truth! The girl was my sister—my dear, my most unhappy sister. Now, listen, and I will tell you her story."

She placed her arm around Rose as she spoke, and drew her down to a bank that hid a clump of laurels. Even her fierce hatred was not proof against the pitiful change in the fair young face; but, as she told her story, it was Emmeline alone of whom she thought. Rose's head drooped and seemed pregnant with the pent-up agony of pain.

Rose listened very quietly. She looked at the sketches, the half-finished outline and the coloured duplicate, with the initials. She knew all about old Mr. Donaldson's accusation and Serge's refusal and the change of name that it had involved. There was no discrepancy in Jennet's story, and she knew that it was true—knew it only too well. But Rose did not doubt it for an instant. Her head ached almost as did when Jennet ceased speaking, but she made no outcry of anger or despair.

She rose slowly to her feet.

"So now you know all!" she said. "If you will be kind enough to give me your letter—" She broke off, thrilling from head to foot at the sound.

Rose had opened her lips to reply, but speech failed her. She took Serge's unopened letter from her hand, and, without hesitation, tore it into a thousand pieces.

"So!" she began, but at that moment a startling interruption occurred. A man came running bareheaded along the shrubbery path, and Jennet saw the red and every line of his grizzled old face.

"What is it, Holland?" asked Rose, recognising the parish clerk. "Not my uncle?"

"No, miss, not the master, but little Stewart," panted Holland, who seemed beside himself. "He's lyin' dyin' on th' bell-ringer's floor, and he'll up an' die afore I can get him to th' church!"

Jennet seized Rose's hand and they ran to the church together, for everything else was forgotten in the moment's terror.

Bert, with his lovely face disfigured, had reached the climax at last. Failing to discover the letter, he had climbed into the vestry, where Holland was busy, and thence into the church, where, finding the door of the bell-ringer's room unlocked, he had climbed up the steep, twisting stone staircase, then raised his head and fell backward down.

The boy was not unconscious, but shrieked when the rector touched him and clung to Rose convulsively. They dared not move him for fear of injury to the delicate spine, and at him slowly back to the Hall, scarcely knowing what to hope. Rose walked beside the litter with her arm round the child's hand still clasped in her own. It was she who helped the housekeeper and footman to undress Bert, who soothed and prepared the poor little boy for the doctor's examination. Bert, in his misery with pain and terror, shrieked when his governess approached him, and would tolerate no one but Rose.

"You will stay with him?" asked the doctor in an undertone. "The case is full injury to the spine, I fear, and everything depends upon keeping him quiet. If you leave him you cannot answer for the consequences. I have telegraphed for nurses, but even when they arrive I must beg that you will not be asks for you."

"I must go home," faltered Rose, but the doctor looked at her with stern surprise.

"You don't understand," he said. "It is a matter of life and death. You must stay!"

So Rose stayed.

The carriage that brought the nurses conveyed Mrs. Mellor to the rectory station to the station. Rose, standing at the window of Bert's room, saw them drive away, and remembered with a sister little smile that twenty-four hours before she had been jealous of Gladys Mellor's visit.

The day passed slowly. Jennet was paying the penalty of her disturbed night and a frightful headache with an severe headache, and spent the greater part of the time on the floor. Her vengeance was at work at last, and yet she was not conscious of any relief.

Rose was invaluable. The nurse on duty could do nothing for Bert without her presence.

"They often take fancies like that," she said, when she heard that the girl could not leave the room. "And in this case, he must be humored as far as possible. So you may give him the medicine, miss. I'll show you how."

Towards evening Bertie dropped into an uneasy sleep, and Rose was about to take refuge in the room that had been prepared for her when Jarvis himself appeared, begging her to go to Sir Maurice.

"My master is in a terrible state, miss," he said. "He thinks you will give him trustworthy information, and he bade me to entreat you to give him five minutes when you could be spared. Indeed, miss, this suspense is very hard for him."

Rose could not refuse. Mrs. Talbot had broken down, and was in bed with one of her worst bronchial attacks, and Sir Maurice had been dependent on the servants for tidings.

The baronet was dressed and lying on his couch, but he looked years older than he had done on the previous night. Jarvis, who had been very uneasy, asked Rose to be as cheerful as possible.

"My poor little boy!" muttered Sir Maurice heavily, when she had told her faltering tale. "I little thought—but Heaven knows it is all for the best——"

"He may recover," whispered Rose, dismayed by this outburst.

"He will die." was the gloomy response, and then, in obedience to a sign from Jarvis, Rose stole from the room. She was walking slowly down the passage when instinct and not any warning, Serge stood before her.

There was no outcry of welcome or dismay, but as their glances met each commented inwardly on the other's unnatural restraint. It was so different from the meeting that they had anticipated.

"He knows—he knows what I know!" thought Rose, and the last faint ray of hope darkened into despair.

"Rose sees that I have heard," commented Serge. But it was Rose who broke the silence.

"There is no need to say anything," she murmured. "We—I—made a mistake last night——"

"Don't distress yourself," he interrupted, "I quite understand. Explanations are unnecessary."

Rose grew pale to her lips.

"I agree with you; they are quite unnecessary," she murmured, and passed on haughtily.

Neither of the lovers noticed Jennet Dare, who had dragged herself from her bed and was on her way to cool her throbbing head in the open air. But she witnessed the whole of the little scene, and her eyes flashed with triumph as Serge brushed past her hastily.

"So far, so good," she thought. "He is feeling the effect of love disguised; tonight I will tell him why."

It was a close, oppressive evening, with thunder rumbling ominously in the distance and a yellow haze veiling the sky. Serge was obliging, but his own troubles sadde and go to his brother's room, for Jarvis was seriously alarmed at the change which had recovered from a bad heart attack brought on by his short interview with Rose.

"I don't like his looks, sir," whispered the man to Serge. "When the doctor comes again to Master Bert it would be well for him to see Sir Maurice, too."

"Is that you, Serge?" questioned the invalid. "You have heard that the child is dying?"

"Oh, it is not so bad as that, sir," said Jarvis, but Serge, who had just received an unfavorable opinion from the nurse, held his peace.

"He is dying," persisted Sir Maurice, "and so am I. You remember what we were speaking about the other night?" he added, looking at his brother with dim, anxious eyes.

Serge nodded.

"It is all right," he said gently. "I found everything just as you described it, and your wishes shall be carried out—I will go myself. It is the least we can do."

"You always were honorable, old fellow," said Sir Maurice, with a flash of his old bronic spirit, "but in this case you're intervention comes some years too late! Say that I have never forgotten——"

"I know, I know," interrupted the younger man. "Don't agitate yourself by going on in that strain again. Now I must call Jarvis, for you are growing faint."

Doctor Black was anxiously looked for that evening. He gave a somewhat more cheering report of Bert, but admitted that the shock caused by the boy's accident had hastened his father's end, and that in all probability Sir Maurice would not live through the night.

"I shall remain here for some hours," he said, "and will send my report away, for I fancy we are in for an uncommonly heavy storm."

It was scarcely eight o'clock, but already the sky had darkened into a lurid twilight, and pyramids of dense clouds were massing slowly over the hills. An occasional growl of thunder had the distant sound as of wild birds seemed to herald the slow approach of the storm. Rose, sitting beside Bertie's bed, shivered as the shadows fell between herself and the little white face. A strange, indefinable fear possessed her mind, and, apart from her own private griefs, she was increasingly conscious of some terrible impending crisis.

CHAPTER VI.

About half an hour before midnight Serge and the doctor came noiselessly out of Sir Maurice's room. The latter was at his heights and raging furiously, but it no longer had power to disturb the quiet figure on the bed. Sir Maurice was dead; the end had been painless and even more sudden than the doctor had anticipated.

"I will go to the child now," he murmured, as they stood together in the passage.

Serge nodded.

"Come to me my room afterwards and give me your report," he said, turning away. He looked broken down and disspirited that Doctor Black felt almost surprised.

"To be sure, Sir Maurice was his brother, but there are brothers and brothers, and I never fancied there was much love lost between those two," commented the shrewd little man as he betook himself to Bert. His surmise was perfectly correct, and, though Serge grieved sincerely for the brother cut off in the prime of his manhood, he was conscious all the time of a stronger and more personal grief.

There had been no time for thought since he met Rose, nearly five hours before, but her face was clear and distinct before his mental gaze as he sank into his chair, and her voice still rang in his ears.

"I made a mistake last night," he repeated half aloud. The room was ablaze with lightning, for, in the general confusion, the servant had omitted to close the blinds. The candle that Serge had brought down with him glimmered feebly where he set it down, and for some minutes he sat still, absolutely unconscious of his surroundings.

Then, recovering himself, he carried the candle to the table in the window and opened the portfolio with a groan. He tossed the contents carelessly about in a vain attempt to find what he wanted, whilst the lightning flashed full in his eyes and the thunder vibrated until it seemed to shake the room. "Where can they be?" he muttered.

"Are you looking for these?" asked a voice close behind him, and, turning round, Serge stood face to face with Jennet Dare. She was holding out the two sketches for which he had been searching, and at the sight of her face Serge's first involuntary exclamation died unuttered, and he drew back a step.

Jennet laughed.

"You are frightened!" she asked. "I have no wish to harm you—physically. I have no melodramatic intention. But I have been waiting—watching for you, that I might return you your property. You were looking for these sketches—I wonder why?"

Serge met her gaze without flinching, and laid his hand on her arm. But she shook

"I'm speaking of Serge Arkloe."

him off with a shudder and continued, no longer attempting to restrain her passion. "Look—look!" she cried, pointing to the sketch in her shaking hand. "Do you remember drawing these, child?" She showed the rough outline that she had treasured for so many years. "Ah, you do not deny it! You need not attempt to deny it! I am Emmeline Dare's sister, and to-night I have come my own time upon you for your share in her cruel death nine years before. Once again I have saved all that time, but the hour has come at last!"

"Are you mad?" asked the man, in a voice of such utter and complete amazement that the woman burst into a taunting laugh.

"Ah, you're mastered—for very short!" she retorted. "But Rose Maple knows my story, and she does not think me mad!"

"Rose—Rose knows? Woman, what do you mean?"

"I thought that would rouse you," said Jennet.

Serge's turned away abruptly, and, regardless of the storm, unfastened the long French window that opened upon the verandah.

The pity that he might have felt for this wild-eyed, passionate creature, the victim of her own wild passion, had become bitter loathing and disgust, and his one impulse was to get her out of his presence. As his foot crossed the threshold, however, a sudden impulse brought him back into the room.

Jennet Dare had sunk down upon the chair she had vacated, but at the sound of his voice she raised her head.

"You are mistaken," said Serge distinctly. "I never saw your sister. I——"

He broke off, glancing over his shoulder in unconscious obedience to a sudden, inexplicable flash of triumph in the other's sallen face.

"There! there!" she gasped, pointing with shaking fingers towards the door that she had left half-open.

Some one was coming noiselessly through the doorway—a slender, girlish figure, draped in white, with long, fair hair, unbound, and strange, unseeing blue eyes shining like stars in the deathly pale face.

"Emmeline!" whispered Jennet. Then, raising her voice, "Emmeline, speak!"

The vision paused irresolute, framed in a sudden glare of lightning. Then, as the thunder pealed through the open window, a look of panic-stricken terror convulsed her face, and, with one piercing shriek, she rushed past Serge and disappeared into the darkness. At the same instant Mrs. Mellor came hurrying into the room, too wildly agitated to betray any astonishment at the sight of its occupants.

"Where is she? Where is she? Emmie! Come to mother, my darling!" she cried. "Oh, Mr. Serge, for pity's sake, My daughter—my poor little daughter!"

Serge was already half-way down the veranda.

"Don't come—I'll bring her in!" he shouted, and Mrs. Mellor sank upon her knees beside Jennet, babbling wildly in her terror.

"Oh, I'm a wicked woman, and my sin her found me out! But she was so good—so gentle—they call her mad, but she is always quiet with me! I couldn't live without her! I sent for her from the asylum—and hid her in my own rooms. Oh, Emmie—Emmie!"

"You're daughter?" said Jennet slowly.

"Yes, yes, miss—you knew it—you saw her last night! She escaped, as she has done once or twice before, and wandered into the Oak Passage. And tonight they called me to Sir Maurice, and I must have forgotten to take the key——"

Serge was kneeling on, half beside herself, shrieking and trembling at each peal of thunder. But Jennet put her aside and walked steadily to the window.

She felt as though she were suffocating and the storm was nothing to her in comparison with her craving for air. She stepped out upon the verandah into the full blaze of the lightning, which seemed to be darting its fiery tongues direct from the clouds upon that side of the house.

Suddenly Serge sprang past her, carrying an inanimate burden in his arms.

"She has only fainted," he said to the sobbing mother. "Take her back to your room. I will inquire into this tomorrow."

The woman obeyed, and, still trembling and moaning, helped her daughter away.

Then Serge returned to the motionless figure on the verandah. The storm was at its height; the clouds seemed to be discharging their artillery exactly overhead, and Jennet was quite unmoved by the tumult and the glare, bending forward and shielding her eyesight before her with blank, unseeing gaze.

"Miss Dare, you must come in—this is not safe!" cried Serge.

The woman took no notice, but as he touched her shoulder she shrank away from him with a violent shudder.

"Go! Leave me alone!" she cried.

"I cannot!" he replied, and even as he spoke a dazzle of blue-forked lightning lit up the earth and sky and a roar like a hundred cannons seemed to shake the house to its very foundations. It was succeeded by a lull, and, whilst the thunder still vibrated in the distance, Serge Arkole spoke again:

"Indeed you are mistaken," he said. "I never saw your sister. Come back—come into the house, for it is not safe to stand here, and I will explain——"

"Explain!" she cried with a terrible laugh. "I need no explanations from you, Serge Arkloe—once Serge Herbert Donald—and ever liar and coward!"

She was facing him as she spoke, and her speech rang out shrilly through the unnatural stillness, but even as the last words passed her lips the veranda and his companions were enveloped in a sheet of living flame—a flame that was blinding. It was seemed to the pair to be the awful crack of doom.

* * * * * * *

When, nearly half an hour later, Serge Arkloe struggled slowly back to life he was lying on his own bed, with Doctor Black and Jarvis in attendance. They told him that the veranda had been struck, and that he had been slightly stunned by the shock, but the surprising part was—

"And Miss Dare—what of her?" he cried anxiously. There was an ominous silence.

"Not hurt? Good Heavens! Not killed?" he gasped, rising on his elbow.

"Oh, no, sir—you know, he down!" said the doctor soothingly. "She won't die—no fear of that now—but she had an awful shock, and I am afraid her eyes are injured."

The storm was over, and morning broke with its watery sunshine and a chilly breeze over a scene of wreck and ruined disaster. Every one agreed that there had not been such a tempest for years, and the trouble at the Hall received far less notice than it would otherwise have done.

Serge Ark Arkloe was terribly weak, but he could not afford to give in, for the household was completely disorganized. Bertie still lived, and the doctors thought he might linger for some days, but they admitted now that the injuries to head and spine must prove fatal in the end.

The boy was not long too drowsy to recognise his attendants, and Rose did not hesitate to leave him to the nurse's care while herself to the rectory, to see how things were going in her absence.

"But I must go back," she told the rector. "They think he will be conscious towards the end, and a few minutes——"

"You look very tired, dear child," said the gentle old rector; but he did not attempt to dissuade her, since, and indeed walked part of the way back with her. Rose was glad when he left her at the Hall gates. She wanted to be alone, to have time to think, as she took the shrubbery path she wandered aimlessly along until she discovered that she was crying.

"What a baby I am!" she thought impatiently. "I have made up my mind to forget him, and I will do it! He has deceived shamefully; he—ah, there he is!"

She gave a little gasp and turned her tear-stained face away as Serge came towards her, still looking very white and tired, but with a resolute expression on his face.

"Yes, I have followed you," he said. "I have something to say to you. I see that my presence distresses you, but I will be as brief as possible. I had no idea of eavesdropping yesterday, and that you were accusing me of being—what?—I——" He broke off, afraid of expressing himself too strongly, and glanced down at the girl's frightened face, now turned full upon him.

"I never saw Miss Dare's sister," he said simply. "I was not even in England until two or three days ago, when my brother told me her story."

"Your brother?" gasped Rose.

Serge nodded. There was a dull, shamestricken flush upon his face.

"I think you understand," he said. "Will you listen to me patiently? Nine years ago, just before my father succeeded to the baronetcy, my brother Maurice—or Bertie, as we called him—was staying for weeks sketching amongst the Derbyshire Moors. Herbert, by the way, is a family name with us—I am Serge Herbert Donald, and he was Herbert Maurice; but as you know, we dropped Arkloe as a surname, my father changed his surname, and Bertie then became known as Maurice. He was engaged within a week or so of his return from that sketching expedition, and he was so much taken up that then with the change in his prospects that he heard nothing of the sad accident on the moors.

"Ah!" murmured Rose involuntarily.

"Bertie knew that he had treated Miss Dare very badly," continued Serge; "but the whole episode was so painful that he wished to forget it, and succeeded so well that even the fact of his child's governess bearing the same name did not recall poor Emmeline to his memory."

"Then how——"

"It was the approach of death that aroused his conscience," said Serge. "Some days ago he told me the story and asked

CHAPTER XXI.

THE NEW RETREAT.

It was true that Weston had again escaped from the snares of the dread Black Puma, and that he owed his salvation to La Death, the girl from Attaco.

The Reptile and the American blacklisted as she was by the Puma, had no fears of its powers. She had faced the threats of that order before and had failed to drive her from Rio.

When she had dragged Weston from the circular prison where, but for her opportune arrival, he would have died in the folds of the anaconda she took him to a secret place in the city and there set about to nurse him back to life. The last struggles of the monster reptile had well-nigh finished the American.

La Death was secretive.

She knew that the escape of their victim would start the Black Puma again on his trail and she bent all her energies to the task of shielding him from its fangs.

Weston had commenced his new work to Kitty and the two women resolved to work together and, if possible, put an end to the common foe.

It was the dread fever that followed Weston's escape that almost drove the arrow of despair into Kitty's heart.

La Death had come to the Puma in time to balk the efforts of the enemies in the United States." The papers declared with delight that it acquainted the American girl with the progress of the Hector Knight case and increased her appreciation.

One night La Death came to the room of her friend and visitor. Her countenance seemed with subdued excitement.

"What is it?" demanded Kitty.

"They have found us out."

"What, discovered his hiding place?" and the face of Kitty Burton went pale.

"Yes. They have found where we have hidden him."

"Then he must go from there. Do you not know another place, La Death?"

"There are many places for him, but in which one would he be entirely safe from the eyes of the Puma?"

"We must set our wits up now. The time is near at hand when we must strike and turn the tables against the men in the United States. They are going to free Hector Knight and you——"

La Death put out her hand and it fell lightly upon Kitty's arm.

"I am harboring my strength to go," said the girl from the jungles. "I am praying every day for strength, and if it comes I will be there. But the American first."

"Yes, yes!" cried Kitty. "We must save him."

The girl from Attaco went away. She was found the next day in the little house where she had concealed Weston and let herself in by a secret way.

She found the young man sitting up in bed and she bent over him and looked for a moment into his eyes. Then she was satisfied that the fever had left him, and his strength was not much better than a child's.

"What is the news?" asked the American. "You have come from Kitty?"

La Death nodded.

"And she sent me the latest papers!"

The girl took some papers from her bosom and handed them to Weston. Then she brought the lamp closer while he read them in silence.

"I must get well!" said he, looking up into her face. "The Puma knows near at hand next steamer will soon clear from this port for home. I must get out of here, avoid the proof I have obtained here."

"But you cannot go now," said the dark-faced girl softly. "You are penniless. You must wait with the rest of us."

"But not for long. We are to open the trial soon, and if we are not there Kendall Gray will be unavenged."

"I see, senor, but you——"

Just then there came to the practiced ears of the girl a slight noise that caused her to fall back and listen.

Weston's eyes followed her quickly and did not lose sight of her for a moment.

She went over to the door and touched it with her ear as she listened intently.

By and by she came back to the couch and looked down into Weston's anxious face.

"What is it?" he asked.

"The scent of the Puma."

"Again?"

Weston pulled himself together with the energy of one who had reached the last hour or the last ditch.

His sunken eyes grew larger and his hand reached beneath the pot pillows of his couch and gripped something that lay there.

"Where are they?" said he.

"It is the spy of the Puma," responded La Death. "It is the foot of the tracker."

"Let him in. Let us have done with him at once."

The girl shook her head.

Weston continued to watch her and at last saw her creep back from the door and stand for a moment in the middle of the room.

"How strong is the senor now?" she asked.

"Strong enough to meet that spy," was the answer.

"Can he get up?"

Weston answered that question by rising from the cot and standing erect.

"Good!" cried La Death with a smile. "Then we can go."

"Whither, girl?"

"To the new den."

With the revolver in his hand Weston tottered across the room, loath to confess his weakness, but willing to desert the place if that would save him from those who sought his life.

La Death helped to steady him a little and the two moved from the place. It was a dark alley-like way where they found themselves a few moments later.

The air, though warm, fanned Weston's face with the keenest delight to him.

He was out of the old place at last! He was again fleeing from the fangs of the Puma and he hoped yet to pay the villain back.

Half an hour later Weston sat in a chair in another house. It was a better place than where he had been last and he felt his old strength coming back.

La Death had left him after seeing that he was comfortable, and he was thinking of the coming hours of vengeance.

The lights in the room were low and he sat facing the door facing the wall. But he was safe there, for La Death had said that she had left a body of a friend whom she could trust, and he felt more at his ease than he had felt for days.

Suddenly he heard a slight sound like footsteps in the adjoining room. Perhaps La Death had returned.

The revolver was within reach for La Death had placed it there, and as the door was fastened on the door he waited for it to open.

Weston had resolved to brook no enemy in that house. He had made up his mind that he would cut his way to the last extremity and he would not quail. The hour for cowardice had never entered his heart. He had marched out the route to revenge and not all the dark-skinned rascals of the Puma could balk him.

The door seemed a long while opening. The silence after the slight noise was torture to the nerves of Weston.

At last, however, the door opened. Weston's hand was at the butt of the weapon and his eyes were on the alert.

Nothing came in but a puff of air.

Yet somebody had opened the door, as Weston knew, and he started from the room.

Suddenly he halted and craned his neck forward.

In the other room there was a streak of light and he caught sight of something that lay on the floor.

"That's devilish queer," thought the American. "I heard some one in you room——"

He went forward and then stopped at the threshold.

The object on the floor moved and a pair of glassy eyes were fixed upon him.

"What is it?" queried the American.

"Senor——"

The voice stopped and Weston was at the speaker's side in a minute.

He lifted the head of the form from the floor and looked into a pair of the deepest eyes.

"Who are you?"

"I am Benita. I am the love of the girl called La Death. I came from Attaco, I senor. I am near to death."

"But how did you find this place?"

"How does the puma of my native wilds find his next victim? It is the flower of the forest here——"

CHAPTER XXII.

MASTER SHARP AT WORK.

The newcomer was but a boy in years.

In the dusky eyes there was a yearning for the girl for whom he had left his forest home and braved the dangers of wood and river to find her again. Weston's soul went out in pity for the youth and he forgot his own peril and condition.

"Is she here?"

"She will come again," said the American. "You will have to wait for her?"

"She is mine, not yours, senor," and the lips of the boy spoke fiercely after the last word. "She was stolen away from me in the forest and I haven't seen my wild bird for a long time. She is mine, senor."

"No, only my friend in need."

The Brazilian boy drew back.

"You are American?" he said.

"Yes, American."

"And white?"

"It is a long story. It is a story about the Black Puma. I came from the United States——"

"Ah!"

The boy closed his eyes and seemed to reflect a little.

"And are you still in the power of the Puma?" he asked at last.

"I hope I am out of it."

The boy drew something from beneath his girdle and handed it to Weston.

"What is this?" asked the American.

"It is death!"

The American held in his hand a tiny dagger which did not seem dangerous enough to inflict the slightest wound.

"This little thing cannot kill," he said with a glance at the youth. "Its blade is so short."

"It has the death point," was the reply. "It is steeped in the poison of the fer-de-lance."

"Oh!" Weston shuddered.

He handed it back to the boy, and just then they both heard a noise that startled them.

The boy raised himself from the floor and leaned with all muscles tense and his whole frame in a quiver of excitement.

"Is it the Puma?" he whispered with a look at Weston.

The American did not speak, for the next moment there came three raps on the closed door and he hastened to open it.

There was the flutter of a woman's dress and the next instant Kitty stood before the pair. The eyes of the boy became fastened upon her.

"This is not the flower of the forest," he said with a hurried look at Weston. "This is not a fer-de-lance."

"Yes. It is Kitty."

The young girl showed excitement in her eyes as she hastened to Weston's side.

"You are safe," said she in subdued tones. "But who is this boy?"

"It is Berto. La Death's rural lover."

"Then did he come?"

"But a moment ago."

"Sent by the Puma?"

"No, the lad is honest and probably dying."

"Then we must leave him here. This retreat is discovered."

"By the enemy?"

"By Colonel Campo and his band."

Weston's teeth clenched.

"But we escape still. I am strong enough to go. But whither?"

"To the old place, La Death says. It will be safe tomorrow. Once on the water we will be out of the reach of the cabals here. The next steamer will then be provided."

"But La Death?"

"She will go, too. We will meet this woman face to face. The mark is on her shoulder. She is not Marice De Marne, but the wife of Colonel Campo. The hour is in time to turn this trial in the interests of the prisoner in the cage."

Kitty paused and looked down at the boy.

"If La Death finds him here her love may return and she will turn to us traitorly," she said with a troubled look.

"But we must take the lad along——"

"I fear that would not work. I have engaged passage for three. The boy must remain——"

"Where is La Death?"

"She will be here a few steps from here. She is guarding the trail to the wharf. Come. You are strong?"

"Strong enough to go, but I hate to leave the boy. It will kill him."

Kitty ran a look of pity in her eyes went over and stooped beside the boy.

"La senorita will take me to her?" came from the boy's lips.

Kitty glanced at Weston.

"The senor said that is hard to resist," she said. "It breaks up the fountains of my heart," and her hand pushed back the midnight hair that scattered over the youth's forehead.

"Berto go, too," he said imploringly.

"Yes, you shall go. They will make room for you on the boat," Kitty exclaimed. "But you carry a dagger!"

"The dagger with the point tipped with the venom of the fer-de-lance, which is death."

"Well, put it up. We must quit this house. The boat may be here at any time. If we would not fall again into the hands of the Black Puma——"

Kitty went across the room and just then all heard a little sound.

The Brazilian boy pricked up his ears and glided away.

He had the movements of the cat of his native forests, and Kitty and Weston watched him until he disappeared and then waited for his return.

Seconds seemed hours to the pair in the semi-darkened room. The moments were full of anxiety to the hearts of their hearts.

At last the boy came back.

"Is she?" said Weston.

"The trail is clear now," was the reply. "The fer-de-lance has struck."

"Which one?" and the girl cried Kitty.

"Where did you find the enemy?"

There was no reply and the little party made ready to depart. Weston and Kitty led the way, as she had been there before and the dusky street was deserted.

Suddenly the boy stopped and turned upon those behind him.

"It is time," he said with a gesture forward a shaded spot against one of the old shacks on the way.

"What is there?" asked Kitty.

"The spy."

The American girl could not resist the temptation that surged to her heart. She crept toward the spot and was gone a moment.

When she came back she found Weston's wrist and her hand closed there with an emphatic clutch.

"He is there, sure enough—the worst of our enemies."

"You don't mean—"

"Yes, it is Colonel Campo!"

Weston uttered a little cry and they moved on again. It seemed an endless journey to the wharf, but at last they saw the ship in the harbor.

At last! Weston felt like uttering a cry of joy, but he suppressed it.

He saw Kitty at his side and looked around to La Death.

"She will join us later on," said Kitty who had interpreted the glance. "She will go with us and face the woman in the city of our own land."

They found a place for Berto on board the steamer and Kitty and Weston went to their respective staterooms.

The hours passed and the silent figure of La Death did not come aboard.

The eyes of the boy did not close. He watched for his forest love with all the intensity of his passion and his figure, half buried on the deck, was at all times on the alert.

Toward daylight a man came aboard. He disappeared below, but was not unseen by the boy. Presently he reappeared and stood for a little while on the steamer's deck.

The orbs of Berto did not lose sight of him. They saw him move afore-and-aft at last and then he was lost to view.

A cablegram bears a steamer," said this person as he hurried along. "It is the thing for me to do and at once."

The man, Mr. Townley Sharp, the so-called detective, but really the secret agent of Mrs. Paula Deland, the millionairess of the American metropolis.

CHAPTER XXIII.

A MAN TO BE RECKONED WITH.

In the office of the district attorney for the County of Bronx sat a man who this man was known everywhere.

He was a tall, stout, fifty, had broad shoulders, gray eyes and a pudgy face.

It was the night before the opening of the legal contest of Hector Knight and the man upon whom so much depended was quiet enough.

The door opened and the district attorney, without turning around, said, "Take a seat, Mr. Holt, and wait on with his work.

"Mr. Holt" was a man hard to describe. His face was that of a man born on a landscape, his eyes were frog eyes and his little hands were full of warts. He had a manner of smiling at himself and at him hereafter than ever, and when he turned his face to a jury, which he frequently did, there was a smile if not a titter.

But there was Holt, for all his ill looks, was a man to be reckoned with, and no witness who sought to garble the truth cared to encounter him.

At last the district attorney turned to his visitor and met with a smile which was not very often on his face.

"It's the same thing, Mr. Holt. If we had a good case that woman's past, we might expect results."

The man nodded.

"You think she has a past, then?" he ventured.

"I can see the woman who hasn't and I'd show you curiosity. Marice De Marne has an aura about that will unravel with the right weapon and we have to find it—tomorrow."

"And of course you have tried?"

"Yes, I have tried."

"As yet without success?"

The district attorney nodded.

The man's face creased in rugs and ran one hand over the most protuberant warts, a habit he had, and smiled. It was not a very kind smile.

"Do you care to take that end of the case, Mr. Holt?" asked Calvin Quick, the district attorney.

"I am at your service in any capacity," was the reply.

"Very well then. When Mr. Strong is through with the witness you will take her in hand."

Holt nodded.

"It seems to me," he said and then he suddenly paused as if another thought had popped into his head.

Quick waited.

"There ought to be a way to bring out the 'dark forty,' he said the smaller. "I don't quite believe all that has been published about Marice De Marne. She was born in the South, lost her parents by yellow fever, was adopted by a family down near New Orleans and finally—for the gets—detecting wing of Mrs. Hyphen."

"Who should never been able to rake up about her."

"It's too little," remarked Norman Holt. "There are other chapters and they ought to be brought out."

"Those within them out we will have hard sailing."

That is confession that yet the lips of the district attorney had.

"I leave that with you, Mr. Holt," he said, following up some notes on the desk. "I have an engagement and you know that I'll be out Friday that Miss De Marne will be called to the stand before day after tomorrow?"

That is the arrangement, I believe."

Calvin Quick hunched the documents and looked over the top of the table.

Then he went out, leaving Holt sitting in the chair rubbing his warts and thinking deeply. A score of his sunday faces moved. He seemed oblivious to all surroundings and for twenty minutes he remained in the revolving chair.

Had Marice De Marne seen him she would have known at once that this accuse for a man was to be pitted against her after all. He was coached by Hatten Strong, the greatest criminal lawyer in the country.

The gray eyes seemed listless and the face that held them appeared expressionless.

At last Norman Holt stretched his legs and looked around.

He was alive again, as it were. There came into his eyes a new light. He got up and looked around the room. Perhaps he thought he had not been alone.

When he left the office he went wiggling down the street for several blocks and then ventured aboard a car.

He sank back into one corner where he was not noticed, or if he was, those who saw him made disparaging and facetious remarks about his appearance.

At last, after riding some ten squares, he alighted and went up a flight of outside steps.

He knocked at a door at the head of the flight and was admitted by a repulsive looking old man who thought he had discovered a man who discounted him on beauty.

Norman Holt went straight to the one chair in the little workshop and sat down.

"Well, friend Holt," said the old Paduoche—the man of the den was the old mystic of the Tenderloin. "You make a late visit."

Norman Holt held out one of his wirty hands.

"Can you take them off?" he asked.

Paduoche leaned forward and gazed at the warts and smiled.

"You remove such things, don't you?"

"Sometimes, but we've had a good time with them. I should think you wouldn't care to part with old friends."

The smudge grinned, but his smile faded into a stern expression.

"What do you charge?" he asked. "I'm not here for levity, and if I were I'd make a few observations about your own face. It's not a handsome."

Paduoche did not like his caller and was on the eve of telling him that only for the job Norman Holt had suggested when the lawyer went on.

"Don't you ever have marks to remove for the ladies?"

The little eyes of old Paduoche twinkled sharply.

"I have sometimes some business from the ladies, yes," he said. "You know they have noises—"

"Yes, noises," and an amused smile came to the face of Norman Holt. "Don't you know and then how easy to remove tattoo marks from the fair ones?"

"Friend," and the face of the old man came serious, "you have been misinformed. Yours—"

"It is, ha?" and Holt crossed his fat legs. "What if I should make it mine?"

"Which you cannot do."

"What if I should be summoned into court to tell what is your business and what is Stella's Stella?"

"I don't take that all in," and old Paduoche looked at Norman in a manner that betrayed fear and cunning.

"I see you don't, but you can be enlightened. That's it. You don't seem to have removed tattoo marks. Do you keep day and night nurses on your premises?"

"I keep no lodger," snapped old Paduoche.

"Oh," observed Norman Holt. "Let me see, what's your name?"

"What are you going to do?" and the old ruffian sprang forward, his tabouline hand shooting out toward the little memorandum book which Norman Holt had taken from his pocket.

"I merely asked for your full name, that's all."

"But it don't belong to you."

"Not to me perhaps, but it may belong for a use to Hatten Strong."

"How?"

"We may want you as a witness tomorrow or the day after."

"In what case?"

"In the case of the State of Manhattan versus Hector Strong."

The color left the face of the old man shrank inward a little. "I know nothing about that, I don't want to be made land to me business. I make a little money to keep the wolf from the door an'—an'—"

"And the wolf is not a dog, eh?" and Norman Holt smiled for the first time. "Let me see. You are known to the police force, the parish of St. Charles, isn't that it?"

"I did you ask me ear you know?" said the old man, going back to his mongrel French jumble.

"Just for confirmation. But you can escape the summons."

"Escape the summons? How?"

"By telling how much you got for a little work done some time ago."

"For not long!"

Norman Holt rose and laid his hand on old Paduoche's shoulders.

"For Marice De Marne."

The mummy face before him went white, but he was a lion, grand in his shrunken shrieked the old man, but Norman Holt knew better. What he knew was his own secret.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE STARTLING LETTER.

Marice De Marne had just come back from a visit to Hector Knight's cell.

There was a bright gleam in her lustrous eyes and she was all animated by what he had told her of the coming trial. She had passed an hour with Hatten Strong, the main lawyer for the defense, and he had given her some advice that pleased her.

Mrs. Burke-Deland was in the parlor of her sumptuous home and as Marice entered the eyes of the woman dropped over her protege's beauty. Surely she should have been very bringing and this wonderful girl who was now in the limelight of public notice and whose name and portrait had gone all over the world.

Julia Deland as she was called when her married name was not in question, was still a beauty, despite her years, but she was some-other-thing. She was a fool. At the same time she had enough wealth to captivate some wife-hunter who preferred the treat of herself to the coupled by Hatten Strong.

As Marice threw herself into a chair she sighed and threw a look at her friend.

"Tomorrow will be a strenuous day," remarked Mrs. Deland. "We will see a well-filled courtroom. I am told that the demand for admission exceeds the capacity of the court and that thousands will be turned away. I don't see why, my dear, they could not have held the trial at the Grand Opera House."

"That would be a good suggestion and I am a little surprised that none of the papers have mentioned it."

"I thought they would have done so," and Mrs. Deland looked at her jeweled hand. "By the way, there is a note cause for you while you were gone."

Marice De Marne held out her hand and Mrs. Deland placed a folded and sealed note in it.

"I will see Mr. Strong before the trial begins," went on the rich lady. "We want him to see all our friends and—"

"For Mrs. Sembranis particularly," said Marice. "I promised her—"

Then her gaze fell upon the sheet she had opened and her eyes caught the first words.

"What is it, dear?" exclaimed Mrs. Deland as the paper fluttered from Marice's grasp and landed on the floor at her feet. "In the name of Heaven are you ill, child?"

Marice tried to answer, but the words would not come forth and Julia Deland rose to her feet.

"What is it? Some enemy? Some threat?"

Marice could only point to the paper on the floor and the rich woman picked it up.

"Merciful Heavens!" she cried. "But this is false! It cannot be. It shall be, you know—"

"But he is like other men. He is purchasable!" exclaimed Marice.

Mrs. Deland looked at the letter which was written in a cramped hand and the letters straggled like a line of retreating troops.

"But he says he is going away," she said, suddenly looking at the pallid face in the chair.

"I did not read that far," and Marice with a shudder crushed the letter from the woman's hand. "I see—I see."

"He is dangerous!" "They can't use him. What a monster the district attorney is!"

"I could kill him," and the white lips of Marice De Marne came together. "This would be murder—cold-blooded murder, but he shall die!"

And then she read the letter through, which ran as follows:

"My Dear Lady: Have no fears. I have just had a visit from Norman Holt and he asked me about the removal of the mark. Was under the impression that kind and he took my name, the man did. They want to prove that I removed the cat's head from your neck. Of course I shall not be here. I shall be far away and where they cannot find me. UNPRONOUNCED."

Marice turned upon Mrs. Deland and watched the letter by white hand.

"Who is this man Holt?" she demanded. "What human wolf is he that he seeks Paduoche and dares to call him to the witness stand?"

Mrs. Deland shook her head helplessly. "He must be connected with the prosecution. Rest assured, the district attorney can raise the pariiest of Blackstone Row for his henchmen."

"I never heard of Norman Holt,"

"It was a strange name to Marice, but it had a meaning which she could not but fear to. She had seen that name for-real where she thought of it.

But old Paduoche was too sharp for this man Holt. He would not be found and she was safe. The appearance of Norman Holt and his kind would be able to put at her secret, and she felt assured that she would be able to meet the witness box to blast the cause of the defense.

Up and down she went out of her fears and became herself again.

The morrow would see the beginning of the greatest trial that the city would hold its breath while the court held in its power the fate of Hector Knight.

But there was one little fly in Marice's ointment.

Of late Noble Knight, Hector's father, had seemed distant to her. True, he had met her on numerous occasions lately, but he had suddenly grown cold and his greetings had lacked the cordiality of other days, say was immediately preceding the tragedy of the Othello Gardens.

Marice had thought that Noble Knight had, or thought he had, a secret of his own. She did not know that he had from the lips of the prisoner himself the story of the obliteration of the cat's head, that this knowledge was a confidence in her and that he doubted if she was a fit mate for his son.

Marice went to her room after the last interview with Mrs. Deland.

She wanted to rest for the coming day. She wanted to show to the world that she the woman whose deep wrongs had been avenged by the unwritten law, that she was the fair woman who had been mathered by Knight Gray and whose name had been harried by him without regard to what he owed the sacrifice sex.

And she had gone over the story she would tell. She had told it to Hutton Strong and he had assured her that no one not even the merciless district attorney, could break her down. She was to maintain her composure at all times. The battle was already won. Hutton Strong would sway the jury with his powerful plea, and the unwritten law would score another point.

With such thoughts in her mind Marice De Marne's fair head pressed the pillow.

She rose from the bed once and looked out at the stars that gemmed the great vault of the azure—stars! What thought of what? Of the past? Of the roses of a faraway land where the puma roams through the tropic forests, of the Othello stage and a playhouse where she had reigned as queen, of the presents, of the terrible handling of her flesh—but, thank Heaven, that thing had vanished forever—of the friends she had had those days, of swirl and whirl of the terrible charge against her as Helen O'Grier?

Did she think of these things? Nay. She stood at the window with the warm winds

Force of Habit.

Editor—What is the matter with that new compositor? Instead of following copy in this story and setting up "foaming steed" he insists upon making it "foaming stein."

Publisher—I guess we will have to forgive him. You see, he comes from Milwaukee.

A Bright Lad.

Teacher—Now, Robert, do you know what an isosceles triangle is?

Boy—Yes'm.

Teacher—Well, what is it?

Boy—It's one uh dem t'ings I gits licked for not knowin' what it is.

An Unkind Daughter.

Mrs. Passay—Everybody says my daughter got her beauty from me. What do you say to that?

Mr. Witts—Well, I think it was very unkind of her to take it from you.

Lady Golfer (to would-be caddie)—But what do you know about the game. Can you make a tee, for instance?

The Would-be Caddie—Can I make— Why, in my young days, lidy, I used ter do it that well they called me the tea caddy.

In Luck.

"That grafter will meet with retribution some day."

"Perhaps. But at present he is meeting with nothing but contribution."

A Maidenly Hint.

"George," said a pretty girl to her bashful beau, "I wish you'd tie this ribbon at my throat; I can't see how to do it without a glass."

"Of course, I'll be only too glad to," he said, and at once grappled the strings.

After an unsuccessful effort of five minutes' duration, in the course of which he got as red as a brick house, and perspired like a pitcher of ice-water on a window sill in July, he stammered:

"I—I don't think I can tie a respectable knot."

"Suppose, George," she whispered, with a pretty little blush, "suppose you call a minister to assist."

Like the unveiling of a beautiful mystery the situation unfolded itself to that young man, and he feels better now.

Do not delay but write today.

Holding Hands.

The sentimental youth gazed out across the misty woodlands.

"In olden days," he said romantically, "young men and young maidens would sit out on the rustic logs and holds hands."

The modern society girl's lip curled disdainfully.

"Poor lobsters!" she said in tones of pity. "In these days young men and young maidens sit in a brilliantly lighted parlor and holds hands that are worth holding."

And then she led the sentimental youth to a game of "bridge," and it was not long before the "hands" he held had him writing off checks.

Wonderful Results.

"I thought," said the visitor, "I'd drop in and tell you what your hair restorer did for a friend of mine. When he started using your elixir there were only a few hairs on his head, but now it's completely covered."

"Indeed?" exclaimed the patent medicine man.

"Yes, by six feet of earth."

A Habit That Stuck.

Howell—A good deal depends on the formation of early habits.

Powell—I know it; when I was a baby my mother hired a woman to wheel me about, and I have been pushed for money ever since.

Not Quite Finished.

"Greathead's a friend of mine. He's invented a flying machine, you know."

"Indeed! Has he given it a practical test yet?"

"Oh, no; he's still alive!"

Subbub—Say, boy, can I catch the train out to Melvin?

The Boy—That depends on how fast you can run. It's been gone twenty minutes.

Such Impudence!

Mrs. Newed—The cook is an impudent thing, so she is.

Newed—What's the trouble, dear?

Mrs. Newed—Why, I discharged her this morning and she refused to go.

A Dainty Little Maid.

Every one ought to have her. She is dressed in pretty colors and changes the color of her skirt herself when it is going to run. She indicates when it is wise to take an umbrella or when you can do without. She is the simplest and best of barometers. She is an ornament, a good seller for agents, a pretty gift, a good business souvenir and useful to any one. She or one of her sisters comes postpaid with full directions for only 10 cents. W. P. Randolph & Co., 79 Dearborn St., Chicago.

Heredity.

"Do you believe in heredity?" asked the lawyer.

"Sure," replied the dentist. "My father used to pull stumps when he worked on a farm."

The Irrepressible Conflict.

Horrified Spectator—What are those two old men fighting about?

Unconcerned Bystander—Each has just been telling the other that he wouldn't eat a mushroom of the other's selection. Neither of them would stand that.

No Hurry.

Young Bird (on a tree)—There comes a hunter. We'd better fly away.

Old Bird—No hurry. He's got to climb a fence before he gets to us, and his gun will probably catch in a rail and shoot him. They most always do.

Strenuous.

Jack—What's the matter, dear? You didn't object to my printing a kiss on your ruby lips, did you?

Eva—Print! Gracious! You pressed so hard I thought you were about to engrave it.

Over Ripe.

"Papa!" little Johnny began.

"Now, what do you want?" asked his suffering father, with emphasis on the "now."

"Will my hair fall off when it's ripe like yours?"

"She said I might kiss her on either cheek."

"What did you do?"

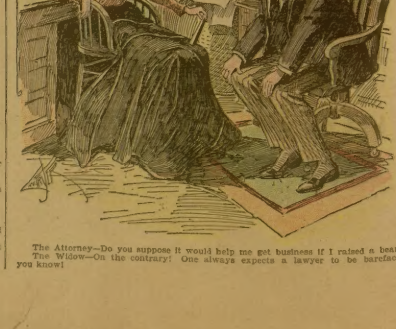
"I hesitated for a long time between them."

Generous Mr. Casey.

"When Mr. Casey died he left all he had to the orphan asylum."

"Indeed! That was nice of him. What did he leave?"

"His twelve children."



The Attorney—Do you suppose it would help me get business if I raised a beard?

The Widow—On the contrary! One always expects a lawyer to be barefaced, you know!

JOLLITY

TRAINED NURSE

Remarks About Nourishing Food.

"A physician's wife gave me a package of Grape-Nuts one day, with the remark that she was sure I would find the food very beneficial, both for my own use and for my patients. I was particularly attracted to the food, as at that time the weather was very hot and I appreciated the fact that Grape-Nuts requires no cooking.

"The food was deliciously crisp, and most inviting to the appetite. After making use of it twice a day for three or four weeks, I discovered that it was a most wonderful invigorator. I used to suffer greatly from exhaustion, headaches and depression of spirits. My work had been very trying at times and indigestion had set in.

"Now I am always well and ready for any amount of work, have an abundance of active energy, cheerfulness and mental poise. I have proved to my entire satisfaction that this change has been brought about by Grape-Nuts food.

"The fact that it is predigested is a very desirable feature. I have had many remarkable results in feeding Grape-Nuts to my patients, and I cannot speak too highly of the food. My friends constantly comment on the change in my appearance. I have gained 8 pounds since beginning the use of this food." "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Neighborly Sympathy.

Mrs. Gabb—Did you hear about Mrs. De Goode's husband? He died last night.

Mrs. Gadd—Well! Well! I'll run right over to condole with her, and see if I can't borrow a cup of butter. I'm entirely out.

Fussy Old Lady—Officer, does the boat from Squedunk leave this pier?

Policeman—Yes. It has never taken the pier with it yet.

Relieved.

Herbert—Papa, when you were a boy did you ever tell a lie?

Father—I am afraid I did, my boy. Why?

Herbert—Nothing, only I was afraid you did not.

Ladies, Preserve Your Youthful Appearance.

Send us ten (10) cents for formula which you can have filled at any drug store at a very small cost. Do not delay, but write at once. Box 491, Blairsville, Pa.

Why It Was Late.

Angry Diner—Hey, waiter; where is that ox-tail soup?

Waiter—Coming, sir—half a minute.

Diner—Confound you! How slow you are!

Waiter—Fault of the soup, sir. Ox tail is always behind.

Sweet Charity.

Beggar—Look here, boss, you've given me a counterfeit.

Goodman—Is that so? Well, keep it for your honesty.

Pa's Opinion.

Little Willie—Say, pa, what is an open winter?

Pa—Any winter, my son. They are all open to criticism.

The Great Doctor.

Men dope themselves with medicines
And let dejection lurk
Within them when they might display
The signs of health if only they Would take mild doses day by day
Of good hard work.

Demand, Not a Proposal.

"Well!" said Cadley, scornfully, "I'll bet you didn't do the proposing. It's a safe bet that your wife asked you to marry her."

"No," replied Henpeck, "you're wrong."

"Oh, come now, be honest!"

"No, she didn't ask me; she told me to."

The Nurse—Look, Bobby, what bright eyes your little brother has!

Bobby—Of course! They're new!

Doubtful.

Eva—I hear that your sister Edna has a young dentist calling on her?

Katharine—Yes, and when we hear her scream we don't know whether he is stealing a kiss or pulling a tooth.

By Different Paths.

Banker—Young man, I began at the bottom and worked my way up to where I am.

Genial Burglar—I got a room above and worked my way down.

The Professor.

"In the midst of 'life,' " said the professor, reflecting on the general uncertainty of things, "there is always an 'if.' "

Beginning a Career.

Aspiring Youth—I understand there is a vacancy on your local staff.

City Editor—Yes, there is; in fact, we are very short-handed, and I can give you a job at once. I want some one to go around and interview Slugg Bulldozer, the eminent pothfan. This paper charges that he beats his wife and starves his children, and we want to know what he thinks about it.

Aspiring Youth—Um—er—haven't you a regular interviewer for that kind of work?

City Editor—Oh, yes, several of them, but they are all in the hospital.

Why?

"Any fool can ask questions."

"Why do you?"

Miss Highsee—My new vocal teacher says I have the best voice he has ever heard.

Uncle Hi—Nonsense! Your ma can call them cows home from a mile beyond where you are.

CHAPTER XVII.

SAVING HAPGOOD.

We walked a long time under the pedestal of a monument erected to the memory of Gig-Kee, the seventy-third husband of the beautiful Atossa, and, according to the professor, a man of rare parts.

"What's the matter with the Prince Consorts?" I asked.

"They age and die," my companion answered.

"And the Queen lives on indefinitely?"

"Her Prime Minister, they say, has taught her the secret."

"By the way," I murmured, "I wonder how the Prime Minister is faring, about now?"

"He is probably back in the palace at this moment. Mr. Zix is indestructible."

At this point a faint glow of light appeared at the eastern gate and was waved back and forth.

"There is Captain Yim," said the professor, with a sigh of relief.

We started forward cautiously, and when we had drawn quite near the light was suddenly extinguished—or, rather, the spherical holding the radium was covered. Nathan knew continually, for light is one of its properties.

"Is that you, Captain Yim?" asked the professor, instinct rather than sight assuring us that we were close to a human figure.

"Yes," was the answer. "The coast is clear. Professor, follow me—here, give me your hand. Mickerson can chop your tail."

"Where are the disguises?"

"They will not be necessary. The course we shall follow through the palace is dark. Hence we shall not be seen."

This change in our plans was a little surprising. Considering, however, that Captain Yim knew his business, the professor dropped behind, I dragged the professor's, and we fared forward.

We ascended steps and descended steps, traversed long corridors, turned many right angle and covered miles, as it seemed to me. At last, we wheeled abruptly to the right, a bolt was shoved, a door opened and we passed into a room.

"The man you seek is here," said our conductor; "behold him!"

A sneeze fell from a radium brazier and I caught sight of the Damascian face of the Prime Minister just vanishing through the entrance. With a startled cry I threw myself forward. A metal door slammed in my face, a bolt on the outside was shoved and the clanging echoes gilded into a mocking laugh that died out along the corridor.

"Trapped!" I cried.

"Aye," added the professor disconsolately, "trapped by Mr. Zix! Fighting him seems like a waste of effort."

"Captain Yim has betrayed us! Where is the fellow, I wonder?"

"Here," came a melancholy voice from the darkness.

We fiuced about and there, sorrowful and dejected, stood the warrior.

"Captain," said the professor sternly, "what means this?"

"It does not mean, at least," replied the captain, "that you have been betrayed. Lay your fault-finding at the door of the lupozinn, Mr. Zix."

"I am entitled to an explanation," observed the professor, indignantly.

"In order to carry out our plans," went on Captain Yim, "it was necessary for me to take one of the guards into my confidences. When we were done talking, the Prime Minister appeared from behind a curtain. He had overheard everything. The guard with whom I was talking made his escape, but I was seized and ordered into this cell."

"I have no blame for you," said the professor.

"Your power-of-the-gods-bullI seam to be failing us, sir," remarked.

"Be patient," my companion counseled. "It may be necessary for them to work indirectly in this instance."

We were in a dungeon in the palace cellar. The gold and silver of the upper floors had given place to aluminum and iron. The cell was small and poorly ventilated, and there was an iron block for each of us to recline upon and we tried to make the best of our situation.

"You are to be confined here," said Captain Yim, "until after the royal marriage."

"Then what?" I asked.

"Mr. Zix has his head foreboodingly. "You have both signed the will of the Prime Minister and have caused him a great deal of annoyance. It is possible he does not easily forget."

"Oh," said I, coolly, "if I had it to do over again I should make the debt still greater."

"Hush!" cautioned the professor; "even these walls have ears."

"Have you heard anything concerning Hapgood, Captain Yim?" I inquired.

"Only that he has a suite of apartments and is permitted to go and come as he pleases. He seems quite contented with his lot."

"I wonder that the Queen could think of marrying a crazy man."

"She probably does not realize that he is crazy," returned the professor.

"But she must know that Hapgood will not be able to long this atmosphere for long."

"Her fancy is rather extravagant, at times, and caprice, if I may use the expression, is her long suit. Her character is in quite keeping with the kingdom she rules."

"It looks as though she was neglected by the lupozinn, upon which prey so terribly upon her subjects."

She is exempt—through the powers of her Prime Minister."

"Then Mr. Zix is the power behind the throne?"

"Atossa bows to him in all things."

We conversed for some time on this subject before hearing of Captain Yim's heavy steps in the corridor without. I arose and glided to the door.

"If that is the Prime Minister," said I, between my teeth, "let him look to himself. I am fresh from my only one. Hence-forth I will rise him anywhere."

The professor, I could see, had a mind to curb me; but before he could do so, the bolt was shoved back, the door pulled open and there, sure enough, was the Damascian—I kiss a person than Hapgood!

My confidence began to fall at my side, and I dropped back." Hapgood was still wearing his ridiculous, ill-fitting gown. The crown was gone, and his appearance correspondingly improved.

"Welcome, my friends!" he cried.

"Certainly I am alone," he returned with a high air.

"Then why have you come here?"

"To release you and your misguided friend," with a contemptuous nod. he exclaimed, piercing me with a rebuking glance. "You regret my good fortune and would hurry me back to the cell? Atossa, who would do me the highest honor in her power."

"Great Caesar!" I gasped, turning to the professor. "Of all the boss that ever got a knockdown! Hapgood here is one that claims the blue ribbon. Don't you know, you crazy fool, that the Queen is going to marry you?"

"I know it well. I have not long to live, but the supreme felicity of being Atossa's husband will persuade his sovereign to compensation enough."

"Don't be too sure of that, I."

"And don't you be a dog in the manger," he rapped out. "You can't have the Queen yourself, and you want any one else to have her."

I flung up my hands and turned away.

"Remember," Professor Markham whispered to me, "that he is not accountable for what he says."

Swallowing my derision, I faced Hapgood again.

"You are going to set us free?" I queried.

"That is why I have come here. The door is open and I will personally conduct you to the palace gate."

"From the way you talk, I suppose you are not going with us?"

"I could not think of such a thing."

"But, Hapgood, it is quite possible we may be able to get back to our own world."

"What is there in your own world for me? This one is quite big enough for me. I shall remain here."

"Mike has deserted him," said I, looking at the professor.

"Let him lead us to the gate," and, as he spoke, the professor laid one hand on the breast of his tunic.

I drew him aside. "Are you crazy?"

"Aren't you going to use the hypoderm?" I whispered.

"At the gate," he answered. "Prepare to hold him when we get there. I will pass the word to Captain Yim."

The latter came forward and out.

"Not you," said Hapgood shortly, pointing his finger at Captain Yim.

"He must go with us," declared. "He was trying to befriend you, Hapgood, or he would not be in this place."

"I should think you outsiders would have sense enough to let a fellow alone," grumbled Hapgood, in almost the same breath into trouble by doing this."

"We cannot leave Captain Yim," said Professor Markham gravely.

"Then take him and begone," grunted Hapgood, and flung through the door in a huff.

I held to Hapgood, the professor held to me and Captain Yim held to the professor. In this fashion we retraced the course we had come and in almost time before.

Passages and stairways were silent and deserted. We traversed them without interruption. Hapgood, displaying surprising familiarity with the palace, considering his short stay in it.

During our progress I could hear the professor occasionally words with Captain Yim —telling him, no doubt, of the treachery of him and me at the gate.

We came, in course, to the spot where the Prime Minister, posing as Captain Yim, had met us.

"I go no farther," said Hapgood. "Have you any glimmerings in readiness?"

"We have," answered Captain Yim "that is," he added, "if Mr. Zix has not caused them to be taken away."

"Then good-by to you," said the demented broker; "and if you are again captured, do not look to me for further favors."

"Now, Nickerson!" spoke up the professor briskly.

Instantly I flung my arms about Hapgood, the captain hurrying to my assistance. Our prisoner struggling like a maniac, shouting for help in a voice that reverberated thunderously about the palace.

"Give me his arm—quick!" exclaimed the professor. "Smother those shouts, if you can."

We did our best, but the alarm that had already been raised was more than enough. Wild commotion was heard within the palace, doors slammed, running feet echoed on the metal tiles, myriads of small lights appeared at windows, doors, on the roof and in the courtyard and excited questions and answers were bandied back and forth.

"There!" cried the professor, "the worst part of our task is over with. See if the birds are where you left them, Captain, Yim."

Hapgood's struggles ceased as if by magic, as if by magic, too, the radium mountain offered us day.

Our rescued friend wore a dazed look, gave over his struggles and stretched himself erect.

"Where am I? What has happened?"

"We're in a tight corner, Hapgood," said I, "and all Zurrna will soon be after us."

"Oh, Nickerson! is that you?" He yawned and rubbed his eyes. "I feel as though I had been having a nightmare. If you are helping me to escape—"

"We are," I interrupted. "Here come our glimmerers."

Captain Yim hurried toward us with four birds in his hands. Four birds were being pulled off their roosts, prodded into wakefulness and bridled for flight; guards on the ground were scattering in search of our great staircase.

"It will be up-and-tuck," said Hapgood, cool as you please, as his eyes took in the comprehensive outpouring that threatened to engulf us.

"Mount!" I urged, flinging myself to the back of a convenient transport.

"Where are we going?"

"Leave that to us."

The mounting Captain Yim and the professor were already in place, then upward we soared, skimming over the tops of the lupozinn fumnels, and onward at breakneck speed toward the mysterious sphere that was our only hope.

CHAPTER XVII.

EAMES TURNS A TRICK.

Looking back on our visit to the Imperial Hall of Records, I can see beginnings of a continual flight, with an occasional halt wherein we experienced thrills and plumed ourselves on the narrowness of our freedom. This, I was told by our good professor, was typical of the capture of the unforseen, which was always expected.

Of the thrilling incidents during our curious extravagant adventures, the reclaiming of Hapgood from his crazed condition will stand out in the first rank. No sooner had the deranged beau released in his veins than his diadem was suddenly withheld, and he became his genial and sympathetic self. The failure of the bolt to attend the professor and me was entirely within the range of coincidence, but the recovery of Hapgood could be in no manner explained. The deracina had shown their beneficent power beyond all precedentcure.

A culminating feature of the affair occurred during our headlong flight toward the Sphere of Gravitation. We were to be wing-and-wing with Hapgood and observed him arising in the garments for which that frightful tunic I possessed a mere veneer.

In a little time he found what he was after—the double-headed coin wherewith he had so often signalled himself and added the weakness that men have for feeling that fate points them the way of their secret desires. Flinging it in the air, he allowed it to drop far, far into the region below. Then he turned to me with a broad smile.

I wonder how that thing ever came to have such an influence over me?" he remarked. "Somehow I am beginning to feel that I am myself once more, Nickerson."

I was struck with the similarity of his action with the coin and Eames treatment of the loaded cube. Have you taken the drastic step immediately after the professor's return from the new hazili. There was a truth here which no thoughtful mind could ignore.

"What do you remember last, Hapgood," I asked, "prior to your awakening?"

"The loss of a cent," he answered promptly, "which I had been hoarding against the time my nerves should call for it. It was the shock, I think, which brought a head glimmering."

"Do you remember seeing me—and the professor?"

"No."

"And you haven't the least notion of what you said?"

"Not a recall a word. What did I say?"

"I won't distress you by going over the scene," said I, glad in my heart that this acknowledgement had swept away my last doubt.

That was an inopportune time for conversation. This was brought home to us at a juncture, by Captain Yim.

"They are coming!" he cried. "I he called. The rest of us turned our heads and beheld a swift pursuing fleet of warriors and civilians diminishing the distance that lay between us.

"In ten minutes," added Captain Yim, "they will be close enough to begin hurling their interdictus balls. Then disaster cannot help befalling us."

I could see that the professor was worried.

"Forge ahead of us, Captain," he counseled. "Take the lead and allow the rest of us to form a screen behind you."

Captain Yim tossed his head proudly.

"When my troops charge," he answered, "I head the van; when they retreat I am with the rear-guard."

"That's a fine sentiment, but hardly applicable in the present emergency. The lupozinn balls can have no effect upon myself, or Nickerson, or Hapgood. On the other hand, you are directly open to their deadly efforts.

"I don't understand," returned the puzzled captain.

"I know you don't," persisted the professor, "but just take my word for it. Fly on ahead now, there's a good fellow."

At that instant the familiar popping of a ball was heard and I saw that one of them had landed on the professor's shoulder. A glance to rearward discovered the one-eyed guard just withdrawing his right hand. He was a powerful fellow and had made a phenomenal throw.

Captain Yim looked at the professor anxiously.

"Nothing will happen," smiled the little man. And nothing did. The captain, consumed with wonder, urged his glimpanzee into the lead.

We were yet a long way from the Sphere of Gravitation, and if the balls had no effect there remained the contingency of a mid-air hand-to-hand conflict. Our foes were in sufficient force literally to overwhelm us.

Five minutes more and the pursuers were showering us with their queer projectiles; but, through the gunner, Hapgood and I were hit repeatedly, the missiles were as harmless as so many globes of glass.

Captain Yim had the monopoly of the amusement. Those behind us were in a promptly perplexed.

Various accidents, also, were thinning their ranks. Their number, however, could be lessened only so fast without appreciably lessening our danger.

We were in the Sphere before they overtake us!" shouted the professor, his face even whiter than usual and writhing.

"Impossible!" cried Captain Yim called back. "There is no hope for us."

The captain was not frightened. He had weighed the situation calmly and was equally calm in announcing the outcome.

"But I say we will!" was born of the logic of all desperadium, gloriously futile, yet has upheld the Saxon spirit.

Captain Yim's words were hardly off his lips before a yellow ball, starting between Hapgood and me, struck him squarely. The effect was instantaneous. His bird began to flutter, to lose speed and to collapse slowly in the air.

It was my not to clasp the valiant captain as he was about to be unseated, and to cling to him while the glimpanzee dropped earthward. As the bird, with its double burden, began to lag—

"Release me, Nickerson," implored the captain. "I do no more than hamper you. Besides, the end will be the same."

"I'll not!" I replied grimly, "or I might as well hang on to you as to let you slide. We will both be saved, or both lost. I promise you that."

We were disheartened. There appeared no possible loophole through which we might effect our escape. Realizing this fully as much as we did, our pursuers set up a chorus of exultant cries.

"I am more than sorry," spoke up Hapgood, "that I should be the sole cause of our unhappy predicament."

"Nonsense, sir, sir," answered the professor, "but let me assure you that your regret is uncalled for. If any blame was beside the question. Nickerson, is there any way in which we can help you from your dilemma?"

"'Tis useless labor," said the captain, "it should right myself free but for the fear of dragging Nickerson with me."

In that critical moment, when the Zurmans were arching out to surround us, when our only hope was in despair and when defeat and capture appeared inevitable the tide of fortune turned; and it turned so mysteriously, yet so completely, that we were dazed and dumfounded.

The pursuing glimpanzets, instead of surrounding us, whirled abruptly and, with a shriek upon shriek, started back toward the capital.

"Can I believe my eyes?" cried Happood.

"A most astounding occurrence!" exclaimed the professor.

"What do you think of this move, Captain?" I asked of the man I was supporting.

"It is beyond me," the captain answered.

In the same way it was beyond all of us, until Captain Yim, who by his own power toward the limits of the Sphere and beheld Eames plunging toward us through space, his plane flying out behind him and his manner one of intense excitement.

"The box!" he shouted hoarsely. "the box!"

"What box?" called the professor. "Is anything happened at the capital?"

"I should say so!" answered Eames. "We had no sooner left that box of white dy's-cal-lens go away from us!"

"Well, well!" muttered the professor, more readily to the inference meaning than I could do.

"Any damage done?" panted Eames, gaining the brink as our birds settled down on the rocks. "What'll happen? Miss Marie Sann is nearly distracted."

"Great things will happen, Eames," said the professor with a smile; "as a matter of fact, one of the great things has already [illegible]

"What, Miss [illegible] he queried.

"Why," was the professor's answer, "to the accident which reinstated the lacelle Minderant every one in this party owes his life."

Then I began to comprehend.

"What in Sun Hill are you fellows driving at?" demanded Hapgood.

And Captain Yim, whom I had just released, looked the same question even though he did not put it in words.

This thrilling and remarkable story will be concluded in next week's Ledger. To every one subscribing for the Ledger we are still sending a camera and patterns free as announced on pages thirteen and fifteen.

me to look in the old portfolio for some sketches which he had made at the time. I took the yellow-covered book in fact, but my less ambitious attempts in the portfolio were unsigned, whereas Maurice invariably marked his in the corner with the name he was using then, "H. de Herbert Donald, you understand."

Yes—Rose understood all too well.

"Maurice asked me to find out Miss Dare," went on Serge, "and if it seemed advisable to acquaint her with the fact of his tardy repentance. He little dreamed that she had been dead nine years, and that her sister, an inmate of his [illegible] hold, only lived for vengeance on him!"

Rose shuddered.

"I know the rest," she whispered. "Dare told me everything, thinking it was [illegible]

"And you believed her, Rose?"

She crept a little closer to him and looked up entreatingly.

"You were so strange—so unlike your self," she faltered.

Serge's brow clouded suddenly.

"I admitted.

You see, it [illegible] rough on me to find out quite [illegible] girl who had just promised to be my wife was not what I believed her to be. Then I proposed to her—I got her pardon, Miss Maple, if I seem to be speaking too harshly, but—ah, Rose—"

"I didn't! You deceived yourself!" she replied, her color coming and going. "I could I help it, if you chose [illegible] me that Uncle Robert's niece [illegible] arily be a handsome maiden? Was it my place to proclaim the fact that I am an heiress? Was it [illegible] and a half [illegible] should be in town still if I hadn't got sick and tired of it, and run away to Uncle Robert in the middle of the [illegible] season?"

There was a pause. Serge looked on, looking down [illegible] and it pulled her hat lower over her eyes.

"[illegible] out," she added [illegible] I met [illegible] up in town yesterday [illegible] carriage with that friend of [illegible] Lord Ethelbert [illegible] an awfully pretty girl who, I suppose, was [illegible] And they were [illegible] sing about me. What did they say?" she cried.

Serge smiled grimly.

They wondered what your object could be in burying yourself in the country, and whether you repented having refused the Prince of Something—or—other, and what sort of a fellow you were really going to share your fortune, and—"

"That is enough!" the woman as her namesake. "Lord Edward is the most near-sighted man in the world—he didn't recognize you at all. But you—why didn't you change your coach?"

"I had no time.

There was another silence, broken again by Rose.

"Well," she said. "Aren't you going to forgive me? I did not deceive you wilfully, but when you found me care for [illegible] and then told me that you would never marry a girl with money, what [illegible] to do?"

Serge made no reply. He was crushing flowers on the table before to cover the wistful little face with kisses.

Rose sighed contentedly, and then the color ebbed suddenly from her lips and cheeks, and she drew her slight figure to her full height.

"I am going indoor morning, Serge, and good-[illegible]

Little Bertie—Sir Herbert now—lingered a few months, as doctors had expected, but ten days after [illegible]

Serge's will was [illegible] Maurice in the family vault, and Arkloe succeeded to the baronetcy and the estate. There was still a sick-room in the great lonely house, for the governess herself [illegible] with an immediate prospect of her recovery. Mrs. Mellor had left the [illegible] Rose and Serge, and the daughter who had [illegible] the innocent cause of so much misunderstanding.

Jennet wanted to die, and for many weeks her recovery was [illegible] but when at last she left by dogress strength returned to her, though the bandage still lay heavy [illegible] eyes.

"When shall I be able to raise it again?" she asked her nurse one day as soon as I can. When may I use my eyes again?"

The nurse made an evasive reply, but something in her carefully-modulated tone gave the unfortunate girl a terrible fear of the bitter truth. She put one or two quick, searching questions to the nurse, but evaded them and then she turned her face to the wall and refused to be comforted.

"What is there to live for" she asked herself dully. "I am blind, helpless, friendless—struck down under the very roof of my enemy, with my revenge unaccomplished—and, who is there?" She broke off, detecting with the strange, new sensitiveness that had become hers already, the sound of an unfamiliar footstep approaching her bed.

"It is I—Rose Maple," was the gentle reply. "They would not let me come before; but you are better now."

CHAPTER III.

THE STORY OF THE WRECK.

Although Lance well knew the story of the loss of the gold, the tale of the mysterious city and the gold, he asked his mother to tell it once more. He could not remember his grandfather, the active hero of the strange adventure, but his father had often related the details of the loss and the discovery to him. The boy now hoped that some detail which had escaped his recollection might be brought out by a new relation of the strange story of adventure, and in this he was not mistaken.

"As you know," began the widow, in a reminiscent tone, "your grandfather was a naval officer during the Civil War, serving under the flag of the South. When the war closed, like many others, he believed that his life would be in danger, and that his property, what was left of it, would be confiscated by the conquerors. Little did the people of the South realize then that the North was to revivify the South instead of devastating it.

"With this belief fixed firmly in his mind, your grandfather turned his face toward the south and sailed for gold, which was hard to get in those days, and which was worth a great premium, and into danger as well, which were hard to secure also. Having accomplished this, at a great loss, he chartered the best vessel available and, with the aid of two heavily bribed fishermen, ran the unarmed blockade and set sail for Honduras, at that time the land of refuge for hundreds of fleeing Southerners.

"He encountered unfavorable weather all across the Gulf of Mexico. He passed safely through the Yucatan channel and was well down the coast when a furious storm struck us. This storm came upon us suddenly, and so completely wrecked the unseaworthy craft that your grandfather had difficulty in escaping with his life, the boats not being lowered a second too soon.

"He finally succeeded in reaching Honduras, however, and, by a happy chance, was given employment of an English firm who had previously done business with him. Here he remained for a time, though the leniency of the American nation, he was enabled to return in safety to his old home.

"But he never recovered from the loss of his fortune. Care gave over the notion that it might be recovered. All his gold, jewels and papers were in the strong safe on board the wrecked vessel, and he was careful not to talk about it, for fear of fruitful not to talk about it, for fear of fruitful not to talk about it, for fear that some enterprising diver might locate and remove the treasure.

"Then the treasure is not in the Gulf of Mexico?" asked Lance. "You have always said the Gulf of Mexico, and so did father."

"You may have misunderstood me," said mother. "The treasure is in the Gulf of Honduras, somewhere in the vicinity of the Bay Islands. I fancy it has done no harm to deceive you as to the location. Even boys of your discretion sometimes blab what you know, my son," added the mother.

"But grandfather retrieved his fortune, didn't he?" asked Lance, smilingly ignoring the last remark. "He was wealthy when he died."

"Your father was the one who accumulated the wealth. He was a successful trader in Honduras for many years, and he married a few days ago," said the widow with a sigh. "I brought him quite a sum at our marriage, and he managed it well. And here are your grandfather's papers. We may as well go through them now."

The careful grandfather had left charts and written records, showing the sum of the wealth and the exact location of the wreck, and these the two eagerly examined. The name of his vessel was the Seabird.

"This looks easy to me," said Lance, after he had examined all the papers. "I'm fit to go easy for anything, and I'm glad we have the trip to the city of the Andes to look forward to for a little excitement. For years the Winlow family has needed just such a machine as lies out there by the old wharf. But you made a slip in the story, about grandfather. You brought him from Honduras back to Louisiana, whereas mother was the trip to the Andes. Tell me about this."

Your father was always greatly fascinated by the story of the City of Silver and Gold," said the mother, "and often planned expeditions to Peru, but somehow he never got started. He also heard many told wonderful stories about that mountain city and its marvellous treasures.

"There are untold treasures of silver and gold in Peru this day," said Lance. "No one knows how much wealth has been taken from the hidden mines of that strange and almost inaccessible country. And there are cities there which the foot of the white man has never reached," he added, with more enthusiasm than doubt every thing not proven by figures or the testimony of many. Of course they are not mighty cities, but they are wealthy ones."

"Here is little doubt of the correctness of your views," said the mother, "for the experience of your grandfather proves it. Failing to find in Honduras the success he sought, he left for a trip to Peru, hoping to enrich himself in the hidden gold and silver mines of the Andes. It was during this trip that he came upon the City of Silver and Gold, of course they are not mighty cities, but they are wealthy ones."

"By a subterranean river," said Lance, who knew the part of the story well. "A river making its way under the mountains."

"I remember that part of the adventure well," continued Lance, "as it was my favorite story when father and I were together. I do not remember father. If he had only lived to see his dreams of the recovery of the treasure realized."

"Don't be too hopeful," said the mother, "for I am afraid you will be disappointed. I shall set Dross and Duff at work at once, getting in the provisions while I lay in a necessary electric appliance for the steamer which may be needed on the voyage. I shall be far enough from the base of supplies when creeping along on the ocean floor, in quest of the treasure or floating high above the mountains, looking down upon the City of Silver and Gold."

The next few days were busy ones for Lance Winlow and his two companions Dross and Duff. The latter were to be the crew during the voyage. At first they had naturally been a little apprehensive about going on the water and up in the air, but the experimental trips had satisfied them that there was little danger.

The jolly fellows were, however, still full of their pranks, each trying to scare the other.

"You'll look fine droppin' down a mile, Dross," said Duff, the latter one day when the work was nearly done, the machine nearly ready for the journey. "You ain't afraid, are you? You'll be afloat in the air."

"I'll stand to yo' business," replied Duff, "or I make trouble, suah!"

He approached the white-faced boy with a razor drawn, and swinging it threateningly in his hand.

"Shall I shave, Lance?" exclaimed Dross drawing a glittering revolver of giant size.

"Look here," shouted Lance from a window of the machine, "you fellows must put up those weapons I'll have you locked up!"

The seeming combatants laughed. This was only one of their many tricks.

"It is quite a safe weapon, Duff. "I made it out'n tin an' keep it to bluff po' white trash with. Look!"

An' this is a glass pistol," cried Dross, "an' contains agae specific. Just you watch me!"

He uncorked the pistol and the odor of rye whiskey filled the air. The negro looked on enviously, but Lance warned the white boy against the use of this agae specific, for fear of this warning was and what trouble came of its neglect, will be seen later.

Before the start was made the boat was written up and written down, photographed and sketched by newspaper reporters and artists, but no one save Lance and his mother knew the destination of the craft or the purpose of the voyage.

The trip to Port Eads was made under cover of darkness. Here two reporters who had accompanied Lance to this point were foiled.

The machine is the wonder of the age," one of them said, "and you are today, Mr. Winlow, the foremost inventor of the day, save only Edison, and you have done something here while even he might not have accomplished. Be sure that your fame shall be told to the ends of the earth.

[illegible] thanked the men for their good wishes and gave the signal for starting. Obedient to Dross' hand, the machine sank into the waters with a hissing sound, and was soon on her way to the Gulf of Honduras.

Regular watches were now set and strict discipline established, never to be relaxed on board the Pioneer. Lance took the wheel first, and Dross and Duff turned in for a little sleep until called in turn.

The electric lights behind beautifully and, at a depth of sixty feet, swung through the water like a bird in the air, and at a speed of more than thirty miles to the hour. The boy owner was proud of her, as well he might be.

And so the daring, resolute boy rushed onward through the gloomy depths to a future wholly vague and unknown. On the one hand lay a world-wide fame, wealth and the commendation of his mother; on the other, failure, perhaps death; but on both sides, however the Fates might decree, were wild adventures and deadly perils!

CHAPTER IV.

A SURPRISED CAPTAIN.

"We must pass through the Yucatan channel and get well down on the coast of Honduras," Lance declared in his assistants at breakfast the next morning, "before we are anywhere near the end of our journey."

While Duff had been preparing the morning meal Lance had spent an hour over his grandfather's papers and charts. There were many diagrams, and these he had studied with particular care. All pointed to the vicinity of the Bay Islands.

The daring navigator had about concluded that the Seabird had struck on a sunken coral reef near the islands and gone to the bottom just as the storm struck her. In no other way could he account for the utter wrecking of his craft.

He had never referred to this belief in the presence of his mother, for they had studied the possible course of the Seabird over together, and there were no reefs such as he fancied had sunk the ship in the path of the voyage as they understood it. In fact, they boy believed that the reef which had wrought such deadly mischief had sunk farther into the sea, and would now be hard to find. He was resolved to pursue his search in accordance with this opinion, and this would take the Pioneer much under water. However, he was not in fear near the scene of the wreck, and so, after breakfast, he sent the boat to the surface and looked out on the still waters of the Gulf of Mexico.

No breeze ruffled the bosom of the gulf as Lance looked from the open hatch of his reading-room. The sun shone brightly. The screw drove the boat along at a speed of thirty miles an hour. The sea was a beautiful one.

Great fishes played about, flashing here and there in the clear water. Broad-winged birds floated in the air, now and then dipping their beaks in the sea in search of gamming over the smooth surface of the water. Occasionally long, fruitful clouds of black smoke indicated the presence of a steamer in the distance. Snowy sails lifted against the blue horizon. All was peace.

About noon Lance discovered, a league astern and bearing down upon him, a great steamer that he at once recognized. It was the Bohemia of New Orleans, plying between that port and Rio Janeiro.

Captain Clairborne of the Bohemia, and Lance's father had been warm friends, and the generous-hearted old captain had often urged Lance to take a berth on his vessel, declaring always that the boy had always been too busy with his pet hobby to accept the offer.

"I'll meet you on the sea some day," he had often said to the captain, "and then we will compare ships."

The captain had always taken the boy's notion for granted, for he never had believer in submarine and aerial navigation.

"If you'd do something more than play with your ideas," the captain would say on such occasions, "there is no reason why you shouldn't succeed, even now, from the [illegible] of the sea."

Then Lance would laugh and change the subject, for he did not want even this friend of the family to know how serious was his work, how steadfastly he had set himself to the [illegible] task! [illegible] which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] would make earth's supply appear small and mean! The boy was not money mad. He wanted enough for his mother and his experiments, and he wanted the pleasure of finding the sunken gold of long-forgotten ages.

Captain Clairborne had left New Orleans one day before the sailing of the Pioneer, and so had read in the newspapers something of the boy's machine, but of course nothing concerning the long voyage or its purpose. It is needless to say that the captain was astonished to see the electric boat ahead of him.

"That's Lance Winlow, as sure as I am a foot high!" cried the captain, as the boy appeared at the window of his reading-room. "I hope he has accomplished something with his boat. He's a bright boy."

Presently Lance slowed down to wait for the steamer, and soon, like a floating palace, it came roaring and puffing across the waste of waters. The Pioneer seemed but a walnut shell in comparison as the captain ordered the rope thrown.

The captain looked over the electric machine with amazement amounting almost to awe showing in his weather-beaten face.

"You have certainly met me on the sea!" he shouted down to Lance. "What do you call that concern?"

"Come aboard and see," was the laughing reply.

Captain Clairborne was not slow in accepting the invitation, and was soon on the Pioneer, accompanied by a tall, handsome young fellow of about Lance's age.

"Come, Tom," said the captain, pushing the boy forward, "I want to introduce you to just the cleverest young fellow on earth! Mr. Winlow, this is my son, Tom."

The boys shook hands, and from that moment were friends. In fact that meeting was the beginning of a long and intimate friendship. Adventures, pleasures and deadly perils shared together only rendered their friendship stronger.

"Look! Look!" cried Lance.

Lance, it may well be understood, showed the captain and his son over the machine with no little pride. They were delighted with all they saw, and expressed their impressions of the boat in very flattering terms.

After all had been inspected, Lance ordered all made tight and sent the boat under the waves. Here he turned on the powerful searchlight and directed the boat on a short cut about the Bohemia, causing great excitement on board the steamer. The passengers rubbed their eyes in wonder as the little boat disappeared beneath the water, and they were wondering if it would ever be seen again when it popped up on the other side of the big boat.

Young Tom Clairborne was enthusiastic. He had never imagined such a trip.

"When I go out on my next cruise," he said to his father, "I think I shall exchange to the Pioneer."

The captain saw that the boy was infatuated with the young inventor and with his work, and, seeing no reason to object to the companionship of the two, replied:

"We shall see about that later."

"I hope he will come with me," urged Lance.

"All in good time," said the captain. "I'd like to go this minute," said the young man.

After a very friendly visit on board the Bohemia, Lance being introduced to the passengers as the inventor of the wonderful electric machine they had seen, the two boats parted company. The next morning the Pioneer was many miles ahead of the Bohemia, and rapidly increasing the distance. But they were destined to meet again, and under far different circumstances.

The next day the electric boat passed through the Yucatan channel and proceeded southward down the coast toward the Bay Islands.

Now the boy inventor studied his grandfather's charts, maps and diagrams closer than ever, and located, as he believed, the very spot where the unfortunate Seabird had gone down years before.

This accomplished, he prepared to send the boat to the bottom.

"My present plan is to anchor the Pioneer at the bottom," he explained to his assistants, "and then search for a reasonable distance on every side. By moving along a little each day we can soon cover this entire valley of the ocean bed."

"Lordy!" cried Duff, an apprehensive tremble in his mellow voice. "How deep is it yer, boss?"

"It doesn't matter," replied Lance. "Down we go."

"Huh!" cried the scared little black man, "de sea just scrunches up things what goes too deep! Monstrous big fish down there, de boss!"

"It can't scrunch us," replied Lance. "We can go down five miles if necessary, and our diving suits will stand great pressure. We need not fear the fish, either."

"A'right, Massa Lance," replied Duff, "dis coon'll go, but he's mighty scared."

"Stay on board, Duff, bross. This is not like going to the bottom of the bayou at home."

"Huh! What if you is killed?" demanded Duff in a voice of contempt. "You ain't got no pretty Dixey gal a-waitin' for you."

"There's a rich and lovely young lady in New Orleans," said the boy in white man, "who only awaits my return to make me her—"

"Ho! Ho!" shouted Duff. "She'll make you her waiter, if she can't get a smooth young colored gemmen like me."

Dross reached for his glass pistol, and Duff at once removed his hat and begged the owner thereof to "shoot him right in front with two barrels out dat gun."

tract, sandy and sloping away from the boat to the right and left. Lance looked keenly about for some signs of volcanic formation, but saw nothing of the sort. The sunken reef theory began to lose ground in his mind, for his charts told him that he could not be far from the scene of the wreck.

"There is no use in stopping here," said Lance presently. "This is merely a clean-swept ridge, and no vessel would remain here, even if she landed here, as the action of the waves would gradually push her into one of the valleys we see."

The Pioneer steamed ahead for two or three miles, every moment sinking deeper into the water. The scene now rapidly changed. The brilliant searchlight transformed those mile-deep, murky surroundings into a fairyland.

CHAPTER V.

DOWN DEEP IN THE SEA.

As the Pioneer glided along through the still water of the under world fantastic shapes, both animate and inanimate, flashed into view. Lights and shadows! Glow and gloom!

Huge rocks now began to appear. Here were deep-sea canyons, hillocks and openings which seemed to lead to submarine caverns. Here were masses of ragged seaweed and bushes which seemed not unlike those growing far up in the light of the sun. The world of water, though separated by only a few yards from the upper world in and near, always remain a mystery to mankind, spite of the daring navigators who brave the lower depths.

Dross and Duff, no longer anxious as to their personal safety, watched the wonderful panorama with wide-open eyes and con-

Lance warned the two to be careful of the glass pistol, saying that there was more danger in the barrel than at the bottom of the sea, and turned the water into the lower reservoirs. The boat sank on an even keel, and was soon far from the surface.

Lance kept his eyes fixed on the register which indicated the depth of the boat's sinking with a little interest the action of the machine in deep water.

It was the first visit of the boy to the unknown depths, and he naturally felt very anxious as to how his little vessel would stand the pressure. Heretofore he had not taken the boat to a depth of more than a hundred feet.

He had great confidence in his machine and never failed to sink lower and lower into the depths of the ocean. The searchlight revealed many queer creatures on every side, but the occupants of the boat had no eyes for such things at that time.

Anxiously Dross and Duff watched the young inventor, seeking to discover by his face the story of victory or defeat, but they saw only a look of interest as he kept his hand on the lever, his eyes on the register.

The boat stood the pressure well. There was no cracking, no starting of riveted seams. The air was also remarkably pure, thanks to the perfect apparatus prepared for the purpose of supplying plenty of oxygen. This, it may be well to state, was not an invention of the boy's, but the kind in use on all submarine boats.

"Here we are!" cried Duff, with a chuckle of delight, as the boat came with a slight shock to the bottom.

The depth register showed over 200 fathoms, or about one-fourth of a mile.

Hopping on a Man.

"Yes, Jedge," said the old colored man who was arraigned for disturbing the peace and asked to plead to the charge, "I reckon I'se guilty of dat charge, but dar am sumthin to be tooken into considerashun. Yes, sah. I had a row wid Ender Besee of the church, and mebbe I dun frowed him down a leetle too hard, but I had de biggest kind o' provocation. Does yo' know what dat pusson did, sah?"

"I do not," replied his honor, "but you may relate."

"Well, sah, I was in my pew in church and blessin' de Lawd fur His goodness and about to pray fur rain and ax dat my lottery ticket hit a thousand-dollar prize when de elder comes along mighty sudden and hops on to me."

"How hopped?" asked the court.

"Jes dun told me he had figgered up and found dat I owed thirty-seben hundred dollurs pew rent, and he wanted it all right down in a hunk to buy tar to stop up de cracks in de flooh. Dat's de way he hopped on to me, sah, and dun took my breath away."

"I see."

"I owe dat pew rent, Jedge, and I hain't gwine to deny de same, but de suddenness of dat hop jes' took my bref away and de fust thing I knowed I had de elder on his back out doahs and wasn't carin' two cents whedder de Lawd sent plenty of rain or let all de watermillyons shrivel up on de vines."

The Quiet Way.

"Speaking about revolutions among our South American cousins," said a Philadelphia speculator, "I had a little whirl at one a few years ago in my sleep. I was in San Salvador to secure a concession from the Government, and I left the President one night after we had eaten and drank and smoked and agreed that the papers should be signed at 9 o'clock the next morning. I went to bed to sleep like a top, and at the hour named I showed up at the palace. Instead of meeting the President I walked in on a chap I had never seen before, and he arose and politely explained:

"'It's all right, senor. At midnight last night the President was bounced out and I was bounced in.'

"'But I heard no rumpus,' I said.

"'O, no, no. We just assassinated him quietly and established the new Government. What can I do for the senor American?'

"It had been a revolution with only one man killed and hardly a sleeper aroused," said the speculator, "and when I spoke of it in a complaining way to the landlord of the hotel he replied:

"'O, well, why make a fuss and wake up the women and children over these trifles? I have been here six years and seen five different Presidents, and probably by the time you come again I will be out of the hotel business and holding down the palace myself. Quien sabe? It was you Americans who taught us rapid transit.'"

A Surprise.

FOR YOUTHFUL EYES

A LITTLE GIRL'S PLAINT.

My brother Will, he used to be
The nicest kind of girl;
He wore a little dress like me,
And had his hair in curl.

We played with dolls and tea sets then,
And every kind of toy;
But all those good old times are gone—
Will turned into a boy.

Mamma has made him little suits,
With pockets in the pants;
And cut off all his yellow curls,
And sent them to my aunts.
And Will, he was so pleased, I b'lieve,
He almost jumped with joy.
But I must own I didn't like
Will turned into a boy.

And now he plays with horrid tops
I don't know how to spin,
And marbles that I try to shoot,
But never hit nor win.
And leapfrog—I can't give a "back"
Like Charlie, Frank or Roy.
Oh, no one knows how bad I feel
Since Will has turned a boy!

I have to wear frocks just the same,
And now they're mostly white,
I have to sit and just be good,
While Will can climb and fight.
But I must keep my dresses nice,
And wear my hair in curl.
And, worse—oh worstest thing of all—
I have to stay a girl!

Two Little Mexican Swallows.

Today and yesterday two little Mexican swallows have been hunting a place for a nest right in our office. One chirps to the other, "Come on in here, Jennie—It's fine. Don't mind those two black animals with white faces. They won't hurt you. Why, I flew quite close to one a while ago and it never even noticed. Come! Come! Come! It's lovely! Come! Come! Come! It's fine!"

"No, no, Dickey dear! I'm afraid. I'm afraid."

"O sweetie, sweetie, sweetie! Do, do, do, do, come! See, I'm going to fly right close up to that big black animal over there!"

He gives a dart straight over to me and a swoop and slips silently out the door after Jennie.

Then they come back together. But Jennie gets timid again and flies toward the door. Dickey jumps down behind the clock.

"Oh! See, see, see, Jennie! What I've found! What I've found! Something nice and white! And good-to-eat! Good-to-eat! Good-to-eat!"

Then he flew after her with a cracker crumb in his bill. He didn't eat it. He carried it to her and coaxed her to eat it, chirping, "Let's go back! There's lots more! There's lots more! Lots more!"

"No, no! No, no! No, no!"

"I'll take care of you, of you, of you! My sweet, my sweet, my sweet! My sweetie-ootie-eet!"

Then they dart back again. She flutters around frightened, but he perches on the clock and sings to her.

"Come here! right here! over here! Dearie, dearie-dearie-dear! Come-to-me! and-take-a-rest! Here's-the-place-to-build-a-nest! Why not eat the pretty white? Take a bite! Take a bite! Take a bite!"

Just for one moment she perches on the clock beside him and then flies away.

He stays on the clock a while and calls after her so sweetly and persistently. He never gives up, but keeps on trying and trying and trying and some day he'll succeed. And then she'll stay with him on the clock and they'll eat the cracker crumbs together.

It's tomorrow night now and I just must tell you this. Dickey did succeed. And Jennie likes to be in the office now just as much as he does.

Wolves Caught.

A peasant in Russia was once pursued in his sledge by seven wolves. Being about two miles from home, he urged his horse to the very extent of his speed. At the entrance to his residence was a gate, which being shut at the time, the frightened horse dashed open and carried his master safely into the courtyard. Nine of the wolves followed them into the inclosure, when fortunately, the gate swung to and shut them all, as it were, in a trap. Finding themselves thus caught, the animals seemed to lose all their ferocity, as escape was impossible, slunk into holes and corners, molesting no one, and offering no resistance. They were all dispatched without further difficulty.

Fed the Orphans.

Once upon a time a pair of robins had their nest in the fence near the house, while a pair of catbirds built theirs in a bush close by. The two pairs hatched out their young about the same time; but soon the robins disappeared entirely. Very likely they were shot or trapped, because they must have been some grave cause for parent birds deserting their babies. The young robins appeared to be starving. When the catbirds came with a bit of food for their young the baby robins would make a great noise and poke their heads out as far as they could.

Presently it was noticed that the catbirds were feeding the orphans.

Every night, too, while one of the catbirds covered its own young, its mate performed the office for the young robins. In this way both broods were reared, the robins growing up as strong and lively as though they had been cared for by their own parents.

Too Hot for Him.

In Montana a few weeks ago a girl named Mary Jones, who did not live alone in her father's cabin when a bear entered.

For a time brain looked around in a curious way, having never made a social call before, but presently he began growling at the girl, and showing signs of an intention to eat her.

On the stove was a kettle of hot water with a dipper in it. Mary backed up to the stove as the bear advanced upon her, and, though she was very much frightened, she seized the dipper and flung a pint of boiling water full in his face. It was as good as if he had been shot with a cannon. He reared with pain, rolled over on the floor, and then fled through the door, and did not stop running for a mile. He had probably seen some hot times before, but this was the first time he had felt any hot water.

Had Hypnotic Power.

Prof. Hugh Scott says that Prof. Henry Drummond could hypnotize almost anybody, but he made no use of the power. He discovered when a boy that he had this strange gift.

At a birthday party a little girl declined to play the piano. Drummond happened to catch her eye and said "Play."

To his surprise she rose at once, went to the piano and played.

At another time he hypnotized a boy, and gave him a poker for a gun.

"Now," said Drummond, "I'm a pheasant; shoot me."

The boy did so and Drummond fell to keeping up the illusion, whereupon the boy, seeing the "bird" move, was about to hit it on the head with the poker. Drummond had just time to stop the hypnotized spectator, and was more careful in his tricks thereafter.

"Mary's Birthday Party."

The little girl had celebrated her third anniversary with a half dozen little friends to help eat ice cream, cake and candy. In the evening, when mother was tucking her in her little crib, she asked the child whether she enjoyed her party and she responded brightly: "Yes, indeed, mamma. May I have another tomorrow day?"

Mother—Now, can you tell me m which of his battles Gen. Wolfe was killed?
Son and Heir—In his last, wasn't it?

Contradictions.

Some of the very commonest expressions are absolutely contradictory. For instance, "slave," which we apply to human beings who are owned by other human beings, really means a noble, the word originally being "slav."

The following are contradictory words also, but we shall probably go on using them to the end of time:

"Irish stew" is a dish unknown in Ireland.

"Kid gloves" are not made of kid, but of lambskin or sheepskin.

"German silver" is not silver at all, nor of German origin, but has been used in China for centuries.

"Dutch clocks" are of German manufacture.

"Baffin's Bay" is not a bay.

"Turkish baths" are unknown to the Turks.

Why are "turkeys" so called? They do not come from Turkey.

"Titmouse" is a bird.

"Sealing wax" contains no wax.

"Shrew-mouse" is no mouse.

"Rice paper" is not made of rice or the rice plant.

"Blind worms" have eyes and can see.

A RIDDLE.

Little Miss Polly McCarthy
Went to a "beautiful party;"
The ten little girls were so sweet,
The ten little boys were so neat.
The food was delicious and hearty,
The games were the best ever seen.

Little Miss Geraldine Storrow
Came home from a party in sorrow;
The ten little boys were "so bad,"
The ten little girls (oh, how sad!)
Were greedy; she "hoped by tomorrow
They'd know they'd been hateful and mean."

'Tis strange, but the beautiful party
Enjoyed by Miss Polly McCarthy
Was the very same party, I'm told,
That made little Miss Geraldine scold;
The very identical party!
Now what could the trouble have been?

A Pony's Good Sense.

A girl 10 years old, named Mary Sears, living in Canada, was riding her pony along a highway when he shied at a cow and she was thrown to the ground and suffered a broken arm. It was a mile to the nearest house, and the girl was not able to mount again and so much pain to walk.

The pony seemed to understand this after a time, and he galloped away and reached the house, where he pleased up a whinnying until he was taken notice of and a man sent to follow him back to the place where the girl was. It was plain that the intelligent animal knew that something out of the usual had happened, and in this case he was just as good a messenger as a boy could have been.

Johnny's Composition.

Johnny was asked to write about the cow. He wrote:

"A cow is an animal with four legs on the under side. The tail is longer than the legs, but it is not used for the same purpose. The cow kills flies with her tail. A cow is bigger than a calf, but not so big as an elephant. She is made small so she can go in the barn door when no one is looking. Some cows is black, and some hook. A dog was hooked once. She tossed the dog that worried the cat that killed the rat. Black cows give white milk. A lot of cows together produce condensed milk."
